THE CALL TO THE COLORS

INTRODUCTION

HISTORICAL survey of the splendid contribution made by the men and women of Knox County toward winning the recent world war constitutes a record of which every citizen may and should feel proud. It is no idle boast that no city or county in Tennessee gave more in proportion to population and wealth, while there were few that responded so readily and so whole-heartedly to every call of every kind that was made by either the state or the federal government.

This unstinted contribution of men, money and materials was the challenge of a great democratic people to the forces of world autocracy, a notice that liberty was more precious than life, freedom more dear than all the gold the world possessed. Blood and money were poured out with the same lavish hand that this city and county gave of their dearest treasures in 1861-5 for what they believed to be right. The men, who in 1918 stormed the well nigh impregnable ramparts of the Hindenburg line or made charge after charge in the Argonne Forest or braved the constant dangers of the sea to destroy the submarine scourge, shed their blood as freely and were animated with the same patriotic fervor as their ancestors who climbed King's Mountain in 1780 and put the British Tories under Ferguson to bloody rout.

This contribution to the war, in cold figures, amounted roughly to more than 4,000 able-bodied men in the army, navy, marine, air, and other branches of the service, of whom over 150 made the supreme sacrifice; subscriptions of close to $14,000,000 to the five Liberty Loans and over $2,000,000 to the War Savings campaign; donations of $220,000 in cash to the Red Cross; gifts of approximately $100,000 to the Y. M. C. A. and $50,000 to the United War Work Committee for home and foreign work; and weeks and months of patriotic work without compensation by thousands of unselfish men and women at home, doing their bit that those who did go across or who were in army camps in the United States might have every comfort and attention that was possible away from home. There was never a campaign of any kind, whether for volunteers to fill up the ranks or for money for war work, that Knox County did not more than "go over the top."

The bigness, the extent of this patriotic sacrifice, toil and endeavor is the justification of this volume. In it the attempt has been made to bind together in lasting form, commensurate with these achievements, the record of all war activities, both military and civilian, of Knox Countians. Every effort has been made to make it absolutely fair and impartial, without particle of bias or prejudice in any respect.

Inevitably errors have been made, but every source of information available has been sought and carefully consulted to reduce these mistakes to a minimum. The records of the War and Navy Departments at Washington, the military archives of the State of Tennessee, the books and records of the draft boards, the columns of the daily newspapers, personal letters and diaries, together with other historical sources, have been pored over and delved into for months to get every shred of information possible in regard to the war activities of Knox Countians.

Every effort was exhausted to obtain the photographs of all men who saw service, realizing that in after years these, with their records attached, will be of incalculable interest and value to those of later generations. If the name, record of service, or photograph of any man has been omitted, it has been unintentional and not because every effort has not been made to obtain them. Two men of the editorial staff canvassed the city and county for more than two months, while advertisements and news notices appeared frequently in the newspapers, requesting that this information be given.

The attempt also was made to give to those who were not privileged to see something of the war, as well as to preserve for those who did, a panorama of the most striking scenes and events in which the American army engaged. Of the several thousand photographs, taken in battle by the representatives of the United States Signal Corps, the choicest ones, some two hundred in number, which were obtained for illustration of this history, give such a vivid insight into the machinery of war and how battles were fought that study of them will be more instructive than many pages of descriptive matter. They cover nearly every phase of warfare on all of the battle fronts.

It has been a matter of deep regret that most of those who went forth in the multifarious branches of government service were so widely scattered that a sketch of each of their particular units was impossible. It was found necessary to limit these sketches to those organizations which contained a large number of men from the city and county.

This volume, written and compiled with the sole desire to give the historical facts by word and picture, both of the war abroad and of the civilian activities at home, is the product of months of labor. It is neither perfect nor complete. Such a volume can never be. Yet it is more accurate, we believe, than any history that can be written or any volume that can be compiled in the future when memory has faded, many of the participants in these stirring events have moved away or died, and the records either have been lost or have crumbled to dust.

ASKING CONGRESS FOR A DECLARATION OF WAR

AMERICA IN THE WAR

AMERICA'S entrance into the bloodiest conflict of all ages was not, as in the case of England and France, a hasty step of the moment. It came as the culmination of a long series of incidents and national injuries at the hands of the Imperial German Government. Its roots may be traced back almost three years to the beginning of the world war. Since the early days of August, 1914, when the Germans shamelessly violated the neutrality of Belgium, ruthlessly put her men, women and children to the sword, and brazenly declared that treaties were but scraps of paper, many in the United States realized that the day must come sooner or later when our government must throw its tremendous strength and resources into the balance and take its part in the fight in behalf of humanity and civilization.

This feeling gained strength steadily in the succeeding months with Germany's use of the submarine as an offensive weapon of war. On February 10, 1915, President Wilson sent the first of his many notes of protest to the German Government, declaring that he would hold it strictly accountable for the sinking of any American merchant vessels. Less than two months later, on May 7, the nation was shocked by the sinking, absolutely without warning, of the great passenger liner, the Lusitania, with the loss of 1,154 lives, of which 114 were American. National sentiment rose to the point of almost demanding a suspension of diplomatic relations with the German government.

However, an open break was averted by the latter's promise not to sink passenger ships in the future without proper warning and without giving their occupants an opportunity to escape. The attack on merchant ships, however, was continued, aggravating sorely the already inflamed public opinion. This led the State Department, after President Wilson had laid all the facts before a joint session of Congress, to send a direct ultimatum to Berlin, stating that diplomatic intercourse would be severed immediately unless its method of submarine warfare was abandoned. Immediately a reply was returned, agreeing in the main to these demands.

After the peace negotiations in the fall of 1916 proved fruitless, the German government, yielding to the advice of its military party that this course would put the war to a speedy end, announced on January 31, 1917, that unrestricted submarine warfare would be carried on in specified zones. Four days later Ambassador Bernstorff was handed his passports and our friendly relations with Germany ceased. On February 26 President Wilson asked for authority to arm merchant vessels as a protection against submarine attacks. A few days after, he appeared before a memorable joint session of the Congress, set forth the attempts he had made to maintain friendly relations with Germany, and asked that the existence of a state of war between the two nations be declared.

On April 4, 1917, the Senate passed the war resolution by a vote of 82 to 6, while the House of Representatives, after a wild and stormy session which lasted until 3 o'clock on the morning of April 6, also adopted it by a vote of 373 to 50. The president affixed his signature to the resolution the same day. Its text was as follows:

"Whereas, the Imperial German government has committed repeated acts of war against the government and the people of the United States, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German government, which has thus been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared; and that the President be and is hereby authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the government to carry on war against the Imperial German government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination, and all the resources of the government are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."

The whole energy of the government from that day was devoted to war measures and war demands. Our army and navy were pitifully inadequate. In the belief that we were independent of European broils, they had been maintained upon a peace basis and used merely for purposes of policing our home and island possessions. With 3,000 miles of water between us and the nearest great nation, they were thought amply sufficient to guard us from all aggression.

Our army, scattered over thousands of miles, numbered about 190,000 men, while our annual appropriation for its maintenance reached a little more than $100,000,000. In the nineteen months between the declaration of war and the conclusion of the armistice, it grew in numbers to 3,665,000 men, of whom more than 2,000,000 were in France. The fiscal appropriation for the maintenance of this military establishment from June 30, 1918, to June 30, 1919, aggregated $15,300,000,000. The growth of the navy was almost in proportion to that of the army. On April 5, 1917, about 250 vessels were under the control and operation of the navy department. At the close of the war, this number had grown to 1,990 vessels. There were 5,000 officers and 70,000 enlisted men of the navy serving in European waters alone when the war ended. This was a greater number than the full strength of the navy before we commenced hostilities. Our merchant marine, an adjunct of the navy, was even more marvelous in its growth under the stress of national necessity and war conditions. The production of merchant ships was at the rate of about 70,000 gross tons monthly in April, 1917. Most of these flew the flags of other nations. Nineteen months later our ship yards along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts had expanded under governmental management until their production was at the rate of 350,000 gross tons a month. Our tonnage threatened England's supremacy of the seas.

To furnish an ample supply of men and officers for the land forces, the national guards of the different states of the union were called into federal service, fifteen camps for the special training of officers were established, enlistment of men to increase the strength of the regular army and navy was speeded up, while the passage of the Selective Service Act on May 18, 1917, provided millions of men to follow in the national army divisions.

Nearly 10,000,000 men between the ages of 21 to 30 registered under the first call on June 5, 1917; the second registration on June 5, 1918, provided 744,865 men; the third on August 24, 1918, yielded 157,963 men. By a later enactment, the draft ages were extended to include all men between the ages of 18 and 45. None of the latter, however, was ever called to the colors, though about 13,000,000 registered on September 12, 1918. The end of the war came before they were needed. Thirty-six camps and cantonments were erected at suitable locations throughout the country to house, train and equip the men in the various branches of the military and naval service.

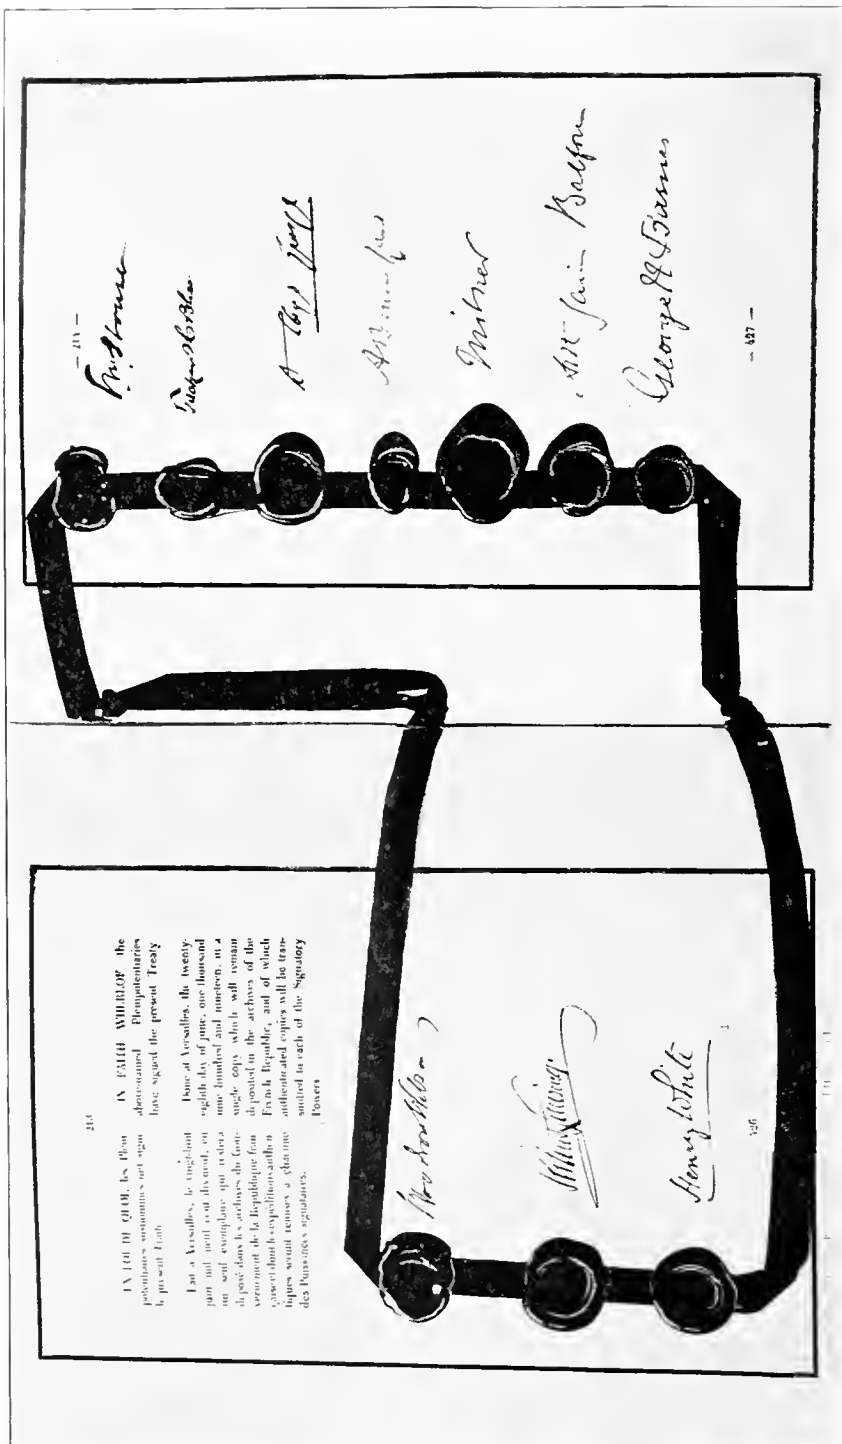

Shortly after the declaration of war, John J. Pershing, then a brigadier-general in charge of the American forces operating against the Mexican bandit, Villa, was called to Washington and made commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Forces. With a small staff of picked officers, he reached France early in June, 1917, and set about the tremendous task of laying the broad foundation for the army of millions which was to follow. Vice-Admiral Sims, who was intrusted with supreme command of our naval forces in European waters, had arrived in England somewhat earlier, accompanied by a fleet of American destroyers, stripped for action against the German undersea terrors. His task was to cooperate with the British fleet in the elimination of the submarines, then at the high water mark of their nefarious warfare, and to work out a convoy system for the troop transports bearing American soldiers to French ports.

After a thorough study at first hand of the British and French systems of warfare and the organization of their armies, General Pershing revised the composition of our forces, increasing the strength of a division from about 14,000 to 28,000 men, and adding to it units made necessary by the refinements of four years of intensive fighting. He obtained French and British officers and non-commissioned officers to assist in the training of the American forces which had not yet been brought over. He also built up his general staff system, so necessary to the efficient functioning of large bodies of troops.

Meanwhile, American engineers had begun the construction of great docks at the ports of St. Nazaire, Brest, Bordeaux and Le Havre; miles of railroads were laid; machine shops and storage depots were constructed, while training areas for the divisions as they arrived from America were laid out back of the battle zone. It was found beneficial for them to spend six weeks to two months in these areas in intensive training before going into quiet sectors for their first taste of actual warfare.

The eastern front of the battle line, extending roughly from the western edge of the Argonne Forest to the Swiss border, was agreed upon as the sector which the American army should occupy when it had grown to its full strength and received its proper training. The plan was that the Belgians should defend the northern end of the line, the British, with the Channel ports at their back for supplies from England, were to hold a wide stretch southward and join the French forces, which, with Paris at their rear, were to link up with the Americans east of Rheims.

Of some of the necessary implements of modern warfare, the new American army had practically nothing in the way of equipment. This was particularly true of artillery, aviation and tanks, all of which were highly essential for offensive operations. By arrangement with the French government, General Pershing obtained from its factories enough artillery to furnish thirty divisions. These guns were the 75 and 155 millimeter rifles and the 155 millimeter howitzers.

 Tasker H. Bliss, headed the list of signatories.

Manufacture of these guns was started almost simultaneously in American factories, but few more than 100 had been completed and passed all tests before the war ended. In aviation, the situation was little better. Our program, which started off with bright prospects, fell down. The French came to our rescue and supplied our aviators with the different kinds of planes necessary for warfare until our reorganized air program had materialized. The first squadron, completely equipped with American planes, took the air early in August, 1918. The Liberty motor, designed by American engineers, made our planes of certain designs the best on the front. Had the war lasted a few months longer, our supremacy in the air would have been overwhelming. The same condition applied in regard to tanks as in aviation and artillery. The French supplied our bare needs until American factories could furnish them in quantity production.

While General Pershing was engaged abroad in these preparations for our army, equally strenuous efforts were being made at home on a large scale during the summer and fall months of 1917. All agencies and departments of the government were organized for the building of an efficient war machine, while the business interests of the nation were reorganized on a war basis. Huge contracts for supplies of all kinds were let; the output of hundreds of factories was taken as a whole by the government; the iron and steel mills of the country were converted virtually into great ordnance arsenals for the manufacture of powder, guns, shells, and other war munitions. A great shipbuilding program was launched to provide vessels to carry our soldiers and supplies to France; many vital agencies, including the railroad, telegraph, telephone and cable lines were put under governmental control; the food and fuel control bill, designed to conserve our supply of food and coal so as to meet both our own domestic needs and the requirements of our allies, was passed. More than a million men were in training camps, learning the fundamentals of military discipline and tactics.

The first Liberty Loan in June, 1917, provided $2,000,000,000 for war needs; the second in October, of the same year, yielded an additional $3,000,000,000; the third in May, 1918, provided the same amount of revenue; the fourth in October, 1918, provided $6,000,000,000; while the final one in May, 1919, yielded $4,500,000,000. All of these were largely oversubscribed on each call from the Treasury. In addition to these sources of revenue, the congress passed income, excess profits, and other forms of tax bills which yielded other billions directly for the support of the war.

Before the end of 1917, five full American divisions had reached France. They were the First and Second Regulars, the Twenty-sixth National Guard Division from New England, the Forty-first National Guard Division from the Pacific coast, and the Forty-second Division, made up from the national guards of 26 states. By the end of October, some of the more seasoned men, who had come across as early as June, were sent into a quiet sector in the Vosges Mountains near the Swiss border. There in the early days of November, the first American blood was spilled in a clash with German soldiers. Privates Enright, Gresham and Hay were killed in a patrol encounter. During the latter part of the same month, American engineers, armed with spades and rifles, helped to repel the German counter-attacks in the operations around Cambrai.

The latter part of 1917 and the spring months of 1918 were dark days for the allied cause. Russia, which had been a bulwark on the eastern frontier by attacks on the Central Powers whenever the latter pushed forward in the west, definitely dropped out of the war. Italy crumbled under the assaults of the Austrians and fell back far into her own territory. France and England had their backs to the wall with the cream of the German army pitted against them. The German submarines were playing havoc with their shipping upon the seas and threatening them with starvation. The European members of the allied cause, therefore, were ready to quit or to accept almost any kind of a compromise in order to obtain peace. Their fighting morale, their resources in men, money, and supplies were at low ebb. German propaganda, sifting through in insidious ways, had nearly sapped their fighting vitality.

Under these depressing circumstances General Pershing worked day and night to bolster up the situation until his army arrived. Tremendous pressure was brought to bear upon him by both the English and French, who were apprehensive of the fighting qualities of the American soldiers, to consolidate his divisions and their organizations, as they arrived in France, with units of their armies, to use his forces as replacements for their own troops, and not to train an independent army which should have a definite sector of the battle front. Each of them was striving to obtain certain advantages which would accrue to them by union of the Americans with them. Each was still acting independently of the other in operations against the common foe, for necessity had not yet driven them to selection of Marshal Foch as Commander-in-Chief of all the allied armies.

To this policy of consolidation General Pershing gave a decidedly negative answer. He was determined that the American army should not play "second fiddle" to any in Europe. He believed it best to avoid such an entangling alliance. He knew that by the summer or fall of 1918 he would have sufficient troops, trained under battle conditions, to constitute an integral force, able to take the offensive in every respect, and to cope with any class of foe they drew sword against.

The storm of the supreme German offensive, heralded in Berlin as the beginning of the end of the war, and announced on the battle front with an artillery preparation that blew everything in front of it to atoms, broke in Picardy on March 21, 1918. The English were overwhelmed, and the wedge between the British and French armies, which was the objective of the drive, came near becoming an actuality. Under the stress of the situation which this crisis produced, occupation of a definite American sector was postponed temporarily. On March 28, General Pershing tendered to Marshal Foch, who had been agreed upon the day previous as supreme commander of the allied forces in France, his whole army, consisting of 343,000 men, for use as the need of the hour demanded. During April and the early part of May, the majority of them were sent to quiet sectors to relieve veteran French and English divisions, which were needed at the more critical points of the German attack. As they quickly showed their mettle, and the need for fresh troops became more acute, the Americans were thrust into the thickest and hottest of the battle in late May and June, when the Germans launched their drive to reach Paris.

The First Division had the honor of making the first distinctly American attack in the war. On May 28, it assaulted the German frontal positions in the Montdidier salient and swept forward to the capture of the town of Cantigny. They held it against all counter-attacks. This action, though local in its scope, had the electrical effect of stimulating the nerves of the weary French, who had waited so long for an active participation of the Americans in the van of the fighting. The Germans also were given an inkling of the American fighting qualities, which had been scoffed at in Berlin by the military party in order to minimize the importance of our participation in the war.

A few days later, the Second Division, including the Marines, was hurried up to help check the advance of the Germans in the Aisne-Marne salient. They not only held the best Prussian Guard divisions, but recaptured from them the town and railroad station at Bouresches. At Belleau Woods, which followed, the feats of the Americans amazed both friend and foe. The Germans were expelled from the woods with heavy losses and thrown back 900 yards on their front. Meanwhile, the Third Division had been in action on the Marne. Its machine gunners, brought up hurriedly from a training area, were thrown into the thick of the fray by assignment to the task of holding the bridge-head on the Marne at Chateau-Thierry. By the latter part of June, the force of the German drive had been exhausted in the Marne salient, and the enemy rested for the final spring he was preparing to make at Paris, the heart of France, and the center of her resistance.

The German plan to exhaust all resources and all men in a final huge effort to crush the British and French, capture Paris, and end the war before the full American strength could be brought to the rescue, had been evident for some time. The reserves on both sides were dwindling fast. Under the spur of necessity, a meeting of the allied premiers, together with General Pershing, was held at Abbeville, France, on May 2, at which the British agreed to place at the disposal of the United States all the ships necessary to transport immediately ten or more divisions. These were to be held in reserve while training, yet ready to be thrown into the line at any time necessity demanded. With this aid from the British, more than 500,000 first-class combat troops reached France from the United States in June and July.

The final offensive of the Germans was launched on July 15. The American troops, who had gone through their baptism of fire and had their mettle tested in the offensive of the previous month, were placed at the very apex of the German thrust in the Marne salient in the Chateau-Thierry district. They met charge after charge for three days, breaking wave after wave of attack. On the morning of the fourth day, July 18, which marked the turn in the tide of allied fortunes, they sprung forward as a part of the great counter-offensive of Marshal Foch, which ended two weeks later in the complete reduction of the Marne salient and the capture of more than 25,000 prisoners, 750 guns, and large stores by the American troops engaged.

In this pivotal battle of the war, after which the glory of German arms waned and the sun of Hun military supremacy quickly set, eight American divisions, totalling about 225,000 combat troops, took part. They were the First, Second, Third and Fourth Regular Divisions, and the Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Forty-second National Guard Divisions. Without them the French could never have launched a counter-offensive. Without their inspiring courage and fierce initiative, it is doubtful whether Paris could have been saved. The aid of American troops in these crucial two months marked another of those periods, occurring more than once during the four years of the war, in which the fate of the allied cause hung by a thread and defeat was staved off by a hair.

Marshal Foch had delivered a master stroke in making the counter-offensive stroke on July 18. Not only was the impending danger averted and Paris saved, but the offensive had been wrested from the hands of the Germans. They were thrown back on the defensive, with tremendous loss of morale to their troops and to the people in Germany.

This stroke also enabled General Pershing to withdraw his veteran troops from the line and concentrate them, together with those divisions which had arrived in June and July, in the Toul sector for the forthcoming offensive against the St. Mihiel salient. The Thirtieth and Twenty-seventh Divisions only were left to cooperate with the British in Belgium and Flanders and to assist them two months later in the breaking of the Hindenburg line at its toughest and most vital point along the St. Quentin Canal.

The formal organization of the First American Army under the personal command of General Pershing was made on August 10. The sector allotted for the first offensive on a large scale by an independent American force extended roughly from a point southeast of Verdun, around the nose of the St. Mihiel salient, and thence east to the Moselle River. The front was about forty miles. The attack was to be in the form of a surprise, and all operations and preparations previous to it, therefore, had to be made by night. They involved a tremendous amount of work of the most delicate nature. It was necessary to bring several divisions from their training areas in the western part of France, a distance of several hundred miles. In addition to the fourteen American combat divisions, which were to be used directly in the operations or held in reserve, it was necessary to have thousands of corps and army troops, ambulance units, hospital sections, and other auxiliary parts of a complete army. The whole number of men to be engaged in one capacity or another brought the total up to approximately 600,000 men.

The artillery concentration was especially noteworthy. With the guns loaned by the French, the Germans were notably outclassed in artillery of all calibers. Three huge naval guns, brought from the United States and mounted upon railroad trucks, held Metz and all the strategic points in the rear of the German lines in their range. The superiority of the Americans in the air was quite as decided as in artillery. Both French and English contributed some of their best squadrons of bombing, observation, and scout aeroplanes.

The attack started at one o'clock on the morning of September 12, 1918, with a four hours' bombardment of towns, strong points, and shelters held by the Germans. At five o'clock the artillery laid down an intense barrage on the front line trenches of the enemy, lifting each four minutes and advancing about one hundred yards ahead of our infantry. The Germans, bewildered by the intensity and volume of our artillery fire, and astounded by the waves of fresh, young, and vigorous American troops, made but little resistance, except with machine guns. Within little more than twenty-four hours, the line had been advanced eight to ten miles at points, St. Mihiel had been retaken, the nose of the salient pinched off, and a new, straight line, running from Pont-a-Mousson through Thiaucourt, Vigneulles, and Fresnes up to Verdun had been formed. What the French had tried to accomplish unsuccessfully through four years of fighting at the loss of thousands of men, General Pershing with his new army had done successfully in little more than a day.

The booty was heavy. More than 16,000 prisoners were captured, about 450 guns of many calibers were taken, a great quantity of valuable material and supplies fell into our hands, more than a score of French villages and towns were released from German domination. Metz, the western hinge of the German army, was brought under the threat of our guns and put in danger of being flanked. The American losses were extremely slight, about 7,000, most of which were light casualties.

Upon the heels of this brilliant accomplishment, the Thirtieth Division, composed of the national guard troops of Tennessee and the Carolinas, and the Twenty-seventh Division, of New York, cooperating with the British and Australians, smote the Germans another decisive blow by breaking through the hitherto impregnable Hindenburg line where the St. Quentin Canal passes through a tunnel under a ridge near Cambrai. Preceded by a galling artillery fire and a strong array of British tanks, the guardsmen impetuously gained all their objectives and took thousands of prisoners. They continued their pursuit of the Germans until relieved on October 19 to recuperate and obtain replacements. Their advance covered about 18 miles.

Less than seventy-two hours after the opening gun in the St. Mihiel drive had been fired, General Pershing, leaving a thin defensive line to hold the gains he had made, began, under the cover of night and with the greatest secrecy, the withdrawal of the greater part of his troops for use in what proved to be the greatest battle in American history.

The main artery of supply for the German army on the western front south of the Sambre River was a four-track railroad line running through Sedan and Mezieres. It also joined with the network of lines around Metz, supplying the German troops in Lorraine. Over this they hauled, in a line almost parallel to the front, their supplies, artillery, ammunition, fresh divisions, and carried back to hospitals in the rear their sick and wounded. The mobility afforded by this system of railroads had given them a great advantage over the allies, because they could rush reserves on short notice from one sector to another, or quickly make a strong concentration of troops at any point for a mass attack.

To lose this vital artery of communication meant either that Germany must surrender, or that she must withdraw all her armies from French soil at a loss by capture of thousands of men and invaluable stores. To safeguard it, her army had built the Kremhilde Stellung, an almost impenetrable mass of barbed wire, trenches and concrete strong points.

The strategic advantage, therefore, of cutting and capturing this pivotal point of the German lines was almost incalculable. The difficulties corresponding were almost as great. The region to be penetrated in gaining the objective was, in part, a forest, in part wooded hills and valleys, admirably adapted to a sturdy defense by machine guns and artillery. Furthermore, there was little time to make adequate preparation for the attack. Between September 14, when the withdrawal from the St. Mihiel sector commenced, and September 26, when the Argonne drive began, there were but twelve nights to move several divisions more than 100 miles, bring up light and heavy artillery, establish hospitals, prepare ammunition dumps, assemble transport, and do the thousand other things that are necessary for a great attack. Only those who went through this strenuous period can realize the strain and physical weariness that it entailed. To add to the difficulties of the task, the rains and the cold autumn nights had begun.

If the attack did not succeed, then General Pershing faced a campaign in the spring of 1919, with double the toll of dead and wounded. He also was confronted with removal from command if he made a failure. In spite of the difficulties he knew he must encounter and the heavy casualties he was certain his army must suffer, he seized the opportunity to deal a death blow at the heart of German resistance and put an end to the war before winter began.

The American line of battle extended from the Meuse on the east to near the western edge of the Argonne Forest. Nine divisions were in the line, while six were held in reserve. Of those to make the attack, only two had had much battle experience. The others were participating for the first time in a great offensive. The attack, preceded, as in the St. Mihiel drive, by a heavy artillery bombardment from hundreds of guns of all calibers, began in the early hours of September 26. With the coming of daylight, the infantry went over the top behind a heavy shell and smoke barrage. After clearing the old German trenches, they made steady progress during the day, advancing to a depth of seven or eight miles at points. The bag of prisoners taken in this initial stage of the offensive amounted to about 10,000.

The enemy was caught off his guard and surprised. But when the scope of the blow became visible and he saw its true objective, reserve divisions, drawn from other fronts and amply provided with machine guns and artillery, were thrown in to stem the tide. They held for a few days after the initial force of the attack had exhausted itself. Time was necessary for the American command to make roads across the old trenches, bring up supplies, run artillery and ammunition forward to support the infantry, and prepare for a farther advance.

This second phase of the battle of the Argonne Forest began with an attack along the whole sector on October 4. New divisions had arrived to take the place of those which had suffered heavily in casualties or were exhausted in the primary drive. The next three weeks saw the most prolonged and bitter fighting

MARSHAL JOFFRE AT TOMB OF WASHINGTON

The representatives of France as guests of the nation joined in paying homage to George Washington, the father of the United States. Rene Viviani, French Minister of Justice, standing before the tomb of the First President, spoke with deep emotion of the common fight for freedom which France and America were taking part in. Marshal Joffre laid on the marble sarcophagus, a plain bronze palm wound with the French tri-color.

"LAFAYETTE, WE ARE HERE!"

in which American troops ever engaged. Progress was made almost by yards, for by now the enemy had brought up the best of his divisions for the defense of this vital sector. They were drawn from the British and French fronts, thereby accounting for the very rapid advance of our allies in the last days of the war. Our losses in this second stage were extremely heavy, but when one division was exhausted, General Pershing shoved in another. On account of the scarcity of fresh troops, some divisions went in twice. More than a dozen were necessary to beat down the resistance on the high land between the Meuse and Aire Rivers and capture Grand Pre, Bantheville, and Briulles.

The final and supreme phase of the attack began on the morning of November 1. The progress was much faster, due to more favorable terrain and the presence of an increased amount of American artillery. The pursuit became so fast that motor trucks were used to overtake the enemy and surround him before his escape. On the morning of November 6, the Forty-second, or Rainbow Division, was ready to enter Sedan, but waited a few hours to give this special privilege to the French who were on our left flank. The objective had been reached and the line of communication had been cut. The other units of the First Army, however, drove on in a northeasterly direction toward Montmedy and Stenay, and all of them had crossed the Meuse when the armistice brought hostilities to a close on November 11.

Had the fighting not stopped at this time, the Germans would have been subjected to another blow at the hands of the Second American Army, formed under the command of Lieutenant-General Bullard, who launched an attack on a wide front on the morning of November 11, with the Briey coal fields as its objective. The First Army, under Lieutenant-General Liggett, was to continue simultaneously its advance toward Longwy. These operations were to be followed by an offensive which would have isolated Metz.

The end of the war found our forces well exhausted, our resources for further campaigning stretched to the utmost. Our casualties in the six weeks of the Argonne offensive were close to 150,000 men, while the number who were engaged at one time or another in its different phases was more than 1,000,000. The Germans did not have so many men, but they used their very best divisions. More than one-third of their total strength under arms was drawn upon and gradually exhausted in the attempt to stem the American advance.

Though our strength had been put to a severe test, there was an inexhaustible reservoir of men in America who were coming over at the rate of 200,000 monthly to fill the gaps from casualties. More than 1,000,000 men were in training camps at home, ready for service when needed. No resort had been made to the huge numbers of men available by the extension of the draft ages from 18 to 45. The machinery was in operation to call them to the colors as needed. The cessation of hostilities came before any of them was sent to camp.

Forty-two complete combat divisions were oversea on November 11, 1918. Twenty-nine of these saw service as units upon the battle front. They were the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th regulars, the 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 32nd, 33rd, 35th, 36th, 37th, and 42nd national guard and the 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, and 92nd national army divisions. Two divisions, the 34th and 38th, were in reserve behind the front. Nine other divisions, the 39th, 40th, 41st, 76th, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, and 87th, were either used as depot divisions from which to fill the gaps at the front or to maintain the lines of communication and supply in the rear. Two divisions, the 8th and 31st, had just landed in France when hostilities ceased.

After the armistice, nine divisions were sent forward to the Rhine as a part of the allied army of occupation. They held the bridgehead and area around Coblenz, Germany. The remainder of the combat troops was sent back to training areas in the center of France, where military schedules to maintain military discipline were kept up until transports arrived to return them to the United States. Wounded and sick men were sent first, and the transportation of divisional units did not start until early in 1919. A constant stream, reaching a maximum of 300,000 men monthly, flowed back across the Atlantic during the spring and summer months. Battleships, German liners, and leased tonnage speeded the American evacuation of France and the home-coming of the men as much as possible.

Whether or not American troops won the war is a mooted question. There has been a disposition abroad to belittle the military effort of the United States, in fact, the whole part played by this nation in the titanic struggle against the Central Powers. Yet when the end came, France alone had more troops upon the front or held more of the battle line. There were 200,000 more Americans than English engaged in France on the day of the armistice. Of this, at least, there can be no doubt—the decisive blow struck by the American armies in the Argonne Forest prevented the prolongation of the war another year. It was the stroke that brought the German military party to its knees and caused it to beg for and accept an armistice so severe in its terms that they were little short of those which would have been exacted under an unconditional surrender.

Great as were our achievements on land and sea in the last few months of the war, our army and navy would not have reached their maximum strength until 1919. Our varied war enterprises were just coming to fruition when the war ceased. Quantity production of artillery, ammunition, aeroplanes, tractors, machine guns, merchant vessels, and the numerous other necessities of war had merely begun. Our governmental machine, after many false starts, delays and mistakes, was just beginning to function properly. The giant of the western hemisphere had merely given a token of the latent strength that he possessed. This token, however, was sufficient to turn defeat into victory and to establish the supremacy of American democracy over Prussian autocracy.

THE PRICE OF PEACE

Twenty-eight nations of the world declared war and took part, either actively or in a small way, in the conflict which shook the fabric of civilization and tumbled down the pillars of government during almost four and one-half years. All of the great nations were engaged and the majority of the smaller powers were participants sooner or later in the struggle.

Below is given the approximate number of men who were under arms, the number of lives that were lost, and the total casualties to the principal combatant nations:

	Men under arms	Lives lost	Casualties
United States	3,764,700	53,169	236,117
Great Britain	7,500,000	658,665	3,049,991
France	6,000,000	1,100,000	4,000,000
Italy	5,000,000	500,000	2,000,000
Russia	14,000,000	3,500,000	5,000,000
Belgium	350,000	50,000	250,000
Servia	300,000	150,000	200,000
Roumania	600,000	200,000	300,000
Germany	11,000,000	1,580,000	4,000,000
Austria-Hungary	7,500,000	2,000,000	4,500,000
Turkey	1,500,000	250,000	750,000
Bulgaria	1,000,000	50,000	200,000
	<hr/> 58,514,700	<hr/> 10,091,834	<hr/> 24,536,108

The debts of the principal belligerents, as nearly as can be calculated by financiers and economists, were:

	Before the war	After the war
Great Britain	$ 3,458,000,000	$ 33,000,000,000
France	6,598,000,000	26,000,000,000
Italy	2,792,000,000	10,328,000,000
Russia	5,082,000,000	25,383,000,000
United States	1,208,000,000	18,000,000,000
Germany	1,165,000,000	30,000,000,000
Austria-Hungary	3,985,000,000	21,738,000,000
Canada	336,000,000	1,172,000,000
Australia	93,000,000	1,212,000,000

“Courage, France!”

GENERAL JOHN J. PERSHING

With the din of battle barely hushed, it is yet too early to gauge accurately how lofty a niche General Pershing will occupy in the Hall of Fame. Yet what he wrought, the myriad difficulties he encountered, the almost insurmountable obstacles he overcame, and the success he won as commander-in-chief, in the greatest war of all times, of the largest army ever gathered under the American flag—of these things there can be no doubt.

"Boys, let's get where we are going" was his favorite expression as a student at West Point. That spirit has typified his whole military career. Whether pursuing Indians across the scorching plains and arid mountains of the West; quelling rebellious, insurgent Moros in the Philippines; leading the bandit Villa in a long and heart-breaking chase across the parched wastes of Mexico; or breaking the back of the German army in the Argonne Forest—in all these strenuous campaigns he cut through the mass of detail and tangle of red tape and drove straight to the heart of the task he had been set to do.

Chosen to lead the American forces abroad, he quickly picked a corps of the best trained officers in our army and set out to France in May, 1917. He cut short the social and diplomatic side of the trip and plunged immediately into the serious business of laying the foundation for the huge army which was to follow. With the aid of his staff, he rebuilt, first of all, the whole organization of our army, planned it on a scale of millions instead of thousands, and adapted its course of training to the new methods of warfare. With his engineers he then set about the construction of miles of docks at the French ports, the dredging of harbors, and the erection of great warehouses to receive the avalanche of clothing, food, ammunition, aeroplanes, trucks, and other supplies that were soon to be on their way over.

At the same time problems of a far different nature were pressing upon him. The latter part of 1917 and the spring months of 1918 were dark days for the Allies. They were ready to quit, to make a compromise peace. The gloom of defeat hung over them and their armies. Wearied with this spirit, General Pershing one day burst out in a statement characteristically brief: "Germany can be beaten, Germany must and will be beaten. Let every soldier paste that in his cap lest he forget why he is in France."

He was right. Seasoned by a few weeks of training in quiet sectors, he gathered six divisions early in July, 1918, to stem the Hun attack on Paris. They met the brunt of it, drove the flower of the Prussian guards back across the Marne, and compelled them to evacuate the whole Marne salient. The fighting stamina of the French stiffened, the ebbing morale of the British returned, the Allies saw the truth of Pershing's statement. A few weeks later he gave the world a revelation of American fighting qualities when he wiped out in 72 hours with the First American Army the St. Mihiel salient, which had been a thorn in the side of the French for more than four years. Twelve days later, with lightning-like rapidity, he struck again at the hardest and most vital part of the German line, the Argonne Forest, which the French had said was unconquerable. Through its tangles and mazes, over almost insuperable barriers, Pershing drove division after division until he had pierced in little more than six weeks the heart of the German lines of communication through Sedan, Stenay and Montmedy. Then the Huns quit.

True to his West Point expression, he had gotten where he was going—to victory over the greatest military machine that had ever been built. His purpose had been realized, for the American army had become a great, compact, self-reliant unit, capable of independent, offensive action, more than 2,000,000 in strength, tempered and seasoned by weeks of the most bitter fighting.

Withal, he was very human. His passion was the welfare of the men in the ranks, "the ninety-five per cent," as he called them. His admiration for their fortitude under all circumstances was unceasing, his care and watchfulness over their health, their comfort, and their pleasures are recorded in dozens of orders issued from his headquarters. This was his tribute to them in the final sentence of his report upon the army's operations: "When I think of their heroism, their patience under hardships, their unflinching spirit of offensive action, I am filled with emotion which I am unable to express."

ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS

On May 4, 1917, just twenty-eight days after the United States declared war formally on Germany, Admiral Sims, commanding a fleet of American destroyers in first-class fighting trim, stepped on land at Queenstown, England. From that day until the early months of 1919, when he returned home, laden with the honors of foreign governments, to be assigned to other duty, he was in supreme command of the American fleet in European waters. In the eighteen months the fleet was in the war, more than two million soldiers were convoyed in safety across the Atlantic, billions of dollars' worth of food and other supplies for these troops and the inhabitants of Europe were transported over-sea with minor loss, while not a few of the Hun under-sea pirates were sunk by our navy. The flag of our fleet was in evidence from the Mediterranean to the White Sea, at Gibraltar, in the Bay of Biscay, along the English and Irish coasts, in the North Sea, and at Archangel and Murmansk. When the war ended, our navy in European waters comprised 338 vessels, manned by 75,000 men and officers. This was a force larger than the entire American fleet before the war began. Credit for the efficiency of this tremendous array of naval craft and the remarkable results that it accomplished has been attributed largely to Admiral Sims. In addition to being responsible personally for its operations, he also had the highly delicate task of co-ordinating its work with that of the British High Fleet. This required not only technical ability of the highest order, but a very keen knowledge of European and British diplomacy. Admiral Sims has held nearly every high post in American naval circles. He has been naval attaché at Paris, head of the naval department of gunnery, where he improved wonderfully the marksmanship of all our fighting vessels; commander of the American fleet; while his latest assignment is as head of the Naval College at Newport, from which the plans and preparations for the improvement and enlargement of our sea forces will be worked out.

GENERAL PEYTON C. MARCH

The lot of General March as chief of staff of the War Department was a most difficult role, and yet one without the glamor or glory which field officers of lesser rank received for service in the fighting line. His task was to mobilize, equip and train the divisions before they went to France, as well as to supply them from the United States after they arrived overseas. Before he was called to Washington, General March had made a wide reputation as a field artilleryman. He had shown executive ability of a high order in all the posts to which he had been assigned. He was a graduate of West Point and thoroughly abreast of all the developments of three years of fighting in Europe. As a student at the army staff and war colleges, he made a fine record. War came, opportunity knocked, and he was advanced three grades to the rank of full general. General Pershing and General Bliss were the only other American officers who attained this rank during the war. Many of the same obstacles and difficulties that worried General Pershing in France also were stumbling blocks and problems for General March. The expansion of our army from less than 200,000 to 3,500,000; the clothing, food, guns, rifles, and other necessities to equip these men; the most feasible manner of raising these millions with least disturbance to the industries of the country; the immense number of records and the huge amount of data that the maintenance of a large army requires; the immediate fulfillment of all the needs and requirements of the army abroad; the tactful handling of domestic military problems and the distribution of war news—these were among some of the large questions and problems that came to General March for solution. They required a cool, quick brain and the grasp of a man of great affairs. General March fulfilled the requirements of the hour.

“HOW sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blessed!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall a while repair
To dwell a weeping hermit there!”

We Shall Not Sleep

"In Flanders fields
the poppies blow
Between the Crosses,
That mark our place;
and in the sky
The larks still bravely
singing fly,
Scarce heard amidst the guns below.

We are the dead.
Short days ago we lived,
felt dawn,
saw sunset glow,
loved and were loved,
and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel
with the foe,
To you from falling hands
we throw the Torch—
be yours to hold it high;
If ye break faith
with us who die,
We shall not sleep,
though poppies grow
In Flanders fields."

This beautiful lyric of the war was written by Lieutenant-Colonel Dr. John McCrae, of Montreal, Canada, while the second battle of Ypres was in progress. The author's body now lies buried in Flanders fields.

Dedication

OF all books this one seems least to need a dedication. Are not the supreme sacrifices of the dead of Knox County inscribed upon the imperishable tablets of our hearts? Are not the heroic deeds of the living enshrined forever in our memories? Yet of all books no one more richly deserves a proper dedication. The men and women whose names are inscribed herein belong to no ordinary race. The blood of the heroes and heroines of other stirring days ran into their veins and felt at home. The mantle of an honorable and glorious past fell upon their shoulders; it has been worn worthily and kept unstained.

No words of mine or any other are needed to enhance the lustre of their fame. They have imprinted on history's most golden page a record of glory in their deeds; and what they have written, they have written. But it is altogether fitting and proper that we pay honor to whom honor is due, and that we should here set down some expression of our great love and pride for and in these men and women of Knox County. In our courthouse yard is a plain, but stately monument erected to John Sevier. Upon it is the inscription: "35 batties—35 victories." Let us go and chisel upon that sacred marble the story of yet another triumph! For the great spirit of Sevier still flames in the men of Tennessee, and his civil descendants are worthy such a sire.

Sir John Foster Fraser, speaking here in the Chautauqua last year, said repeatedly: "There is no glory about war." The statement is true. When we see troops marching out with polished accoutrements and weapons, with firm tread and shining eyes, with movements that are measured, virile and precise; when we hear the martial notes of the bugle and the patriotic melodies of the band, then our hearts are thrilled and we think of the glory of military life. But when war actually comes, the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, as the Spanish writer, Ibanez, has pointed out, are loosed. The White Horse of glittering Militarism, the Red Horse of Bloodshed, the Black Steed of Famine and the Pale Horse of Terror—these four and their riders rush forth above the world. A cold and icy blast precedes them; destruction, want and sorrow follow in their train.

The men so splendidly accoutred, who went out to war, are called up to battle by the Four Horsemen. Behold them! The shining weapons are broken and rusted. The spick and span uniforms are torn and defiled with mud and the stains of blood. The ranks that once marched four by four with steady tread have great gaps where men have fallen. The faces once filled with health and color are now wan and shrunk, and eyes with deep circles under them blaze out, filled with the fires of anguish and with the horrors of what they have seen. Shot and shell from rifles and great guns whine and burst across the field of war. Corpses of men and beasts lie putrefying in the sun, unburied because of the haste of battle. Limbs blown from healthy young bodies lie decaying where they fell. There is an insufferable stench over the whole expanse. It is the breath of the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. Within the area of strife are towns and cities once flourishing and filled with youth and laughter, now desolate. In many homes, in many nations, there are women whose hearts are crushed, there are children who are fatherless, because of men who will never come back. Beholding all this desolation and heartbreak, we agree that there is no glory about war.

Yet there is glory, resplendent glory, upon the heroism of men willing amidst such scenes to risk their lives for the sake of Right. There is glory, radiant glory, upon the sacrifices patriotic men and women have made that war shall not come again and that Freedom shall not die. And if blood spilled counts for anything, if citations and decorations won mean anything, if utmost sacrifices made are anything, then Knox County has earned her crown of glory. The four mad Horsemen, once stabled in Berlin, rallied their tremendous hosts along the Hindenburg line. American valor broke that line and overthrew the Horsemen—let us hope, forever. That line was broken at various points. But to the troops of North and South Carolina and Tennessee, fighting with the British at Bellicourt, Nanroy, Premont, and Busigny—foremost among them Knox County men—belongs this everlasting honor and distinction; they broke it first.

And in the great distinctively American actions, the battle of St. Mihiel and the forty-seven days' battle of the Argonne Forest, our men were in the front. Indeed, it was in these engagements that most of Knox County's soldiers were to be found. They were not organized into one unit. Going into service at various times, in various units, and in many instances being frequently transferred, each man carried on and did his duty. Our men were to be found in practically every one of the forty-two American combat divisions, fighting over nearly every landscape on the Western Front. In the battles we have named they fought with almost super-human bravery. And in Marshal Foch's great counter-offensive along the Marne, when Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Wood, Bouresches, and Soissons leaped upon History's immortal page, men of Knox County wrote their names in blood.

Nor did our men fail to sustain America's tradition of valor on the sea. To the courage and skill of all branches of the Naval service is due the world's gratitude that our land troops arrived on schedule time and kept coming till victory was won. By night and by day, facing storm and tempest and the most hideous terrors of man's invention, watching and fighting on every dangerous water, Knox Countians proved themselves worthy to keep company with the heroic Captain Lawrence and the mighty John Paul Jones. And for some of them the guns boomed out the mournful salute of honor, that told of life laid down for Liberty and Country.

Honor to whom honor is due! For our gallant fighting men we have no words of praise too high. They met the flower of the world's best-trained and fiercest army, and laid it low. We hold in great pride also our men who did not reach the firing line but ate their hearts out longing to go and prove their mettle, meanwhile faithfully performing their duties where they were. Theirs, too, were heroes' souls. Also we bring our grateful tributes to those men and women who served in the various welfare organizations, several of them abroad and at the front, some of them wounded. They did much in sustaining the army's morale. There was no branch of service, military, naval or civilian, in which Knox Countians were not found.

Let not our soldiers and sailors think this country will forget. For over fifty years we have held in reverent memory the men who wore the Blue and the Gray. And now their sons in Khaki will stand beside them always within the Holy of Holies in the Nation's heart.

Most sacred of all to us are those who sleep beneath the Flag, having poured out for it their last full measure of devotion. Very tender is our thought of the fathers and mothers and wives who have given their sons and husbands on Freedom's altar. Their grief is too holy to intrude upon. If we do not often speak of it, it is only because we would not tear their heart wounds afresh. But their boys are held in our everlasting love.

"On Fame's eternal camping ground,
Their silent tents are spread;
And glory guards, with solemn round,
The bivouac of the dead."

This volume will be treasured in many a home. Let us not, however, be content merely with the reading of it. Our men fought for the ideals of Christian civilization as expressed in free America. Let us keep those ideals bright in action. Our men sang time and time again:

"In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me;
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
While God is marching on."

Let it be our high privilege to see to it that the nation whose destiny they have preserved shall maintain inviolate the liberties made secure at such a price. May no force, without or within, be permitted to trample upon our gift of Freedom. In all our ways may we acknowledge Him who brought us to this hour, as we humbly believe, to accomplish justice for mankind. In all our relations, domestic and foreign, may we prove ourselves a nation whose God is indeed the Lord.

(1)—AILOR, LILLARD EARLE

The first man from Knox County who was killed in action in the world war. He enlisted in the regular army September 10, 1913; was sent to the Philippines, where he was a member of the Second Field Artillery; after two years of service, he was returned to the United States and became a member of the Fourth Field Artillery, with which he went into Mexico with General Pershing. He sailed to France December 15, 1917, as a part of the newly organized Fifteenth Field Artillery. After a period of training, his regiment was sent to the Verdun front, where he was killed April 8, 1918.

(2)—AMYX, RILEY S.

Entered the service September 2, 1917, as a member of Company L, 117th Infantry. After training at Camp Sevier, went overseas with his organization, with which he took part in all of the operations in Belgium and in the battles for the Hindenburg Line. His death came on February 3, 1919, near Le Mans, France, as a result of an attack of influenza.

(3)—AUSTIN, FRED CLAY

After enlistment in June, 1918, was sent to Camp Johnston in Florida as member of Motor Truck Company No. 527. He was taken ill on the boat, which sailed September 28, 1918, for France, and died just before its arrival. He was buried at Lambazellec, Finistere, France.

(4)—ADCOCK, THOMAS DWYER

Enlisted in Company C, Second Tennessee Infantry, from which he was transferred to Company C, 120th Infantry at Camp Sevier. He rose to the rank of sergeant. After arrival overseas, he went through the fighting in Belgium in the Ypres sector, but lost his life in action the first day of the attack on the Hindenburg Line, September 29, 1918.

(5)—ACKLIN, CHRISTOPHER COTTRELL

Left home for training camp at Camp Shelby, Miss., on August 5, 1918, where he was assigned to Battery A, 139th Field Artillery, 38th Division. He sailed with his organization from New York on October 5, 1918, but died of pneumonia at Hartley College Hospital October 26 on reaching Manchester, England.

(6)—ANDES, JAMES COWAN

Commissioned Second Lieutenant at the first Plattsburg Training Camp and assigned to Company H, 16th Regiment, First division. He sailed to France in February, 1918. Was engaged with his company in the battles of Cantigny, Chateau Thierry, and Soissons. Killed in latter battle on July 19, 1918, leading his platoon in the face of heavy machine gun fire. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross posthumously.

(7)—AUSTIN, WILLIAM M.

Enlisted September 15, 1917, as a member of Company B, 113th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division. After training at Camp Sevier, he went to France in May, 1918, with his organization. He took part in the fighting in Belgium, but was killed in action September 29, 1918, on the first day of the attack on the Hindenburg Line.

(8)—BENTLEY, JOHN L.

After enlisting in the medical detachment of the Second Tennessee Infantry in July, 1917, he was transferred to the same branch of the 119th Infantry at Camp Sevier, South Carolina. He sailed to France in May, 1918, and went through the training period without accident. He lost his life in action September 1, in the operations in Belgium.

(9)—BERRY, HOBERT M.

After enlistment in the navy at Knoxville in July, 1918, he was sent to training camp in California. He was caught by the influenza epidemic and was sent to a hospital at Los Angeles for treatment. This was of no avail, as he died on October 14, 1918.

(10)—BURGESS, ROBERT TAYLOR

Killed in action on October 8, 1918, in the battle near Premont, France. He was a member of Company I, 117th Infantry, from his enlistment on September 2, 1917. He went through the training period at Camp Sevier and in France. In the fighting in Belgium, he was unscathed. His rank was sergeant.

(11)—COGDILL, BENJAMIN J.

He gave up his medical practice in January, 1918, and was assigned to duty as first lieutenant with the Third Development Battalion, 155th Depot Brigade, at Camp Lee, Virginia. He contracted pneumonia at camp in October, of the same year, and died therefrom a few days later.

(12)—CONGDON, WARREN A.

Enlisted in the 105th Sanitary Train, 120th Ambulance Company, of the 30th Division, on October 5, 1917. After training at Camp Sevier, he went to France, where he served in the Aisne-Marne, Oise-Aisne, and Meuse-Argonne Offensives. Sent to Base Hospital at Langres on October 7, and died there October 26 of typhoid fever.

(1)—BURKHART, WALTER WESLEY

Began his naval career on June 26, 1906. During the World War was on detail duty with the Cuban Navy. Transferred to the U. S. Navy Yard at New Orleans, Louisiana, and saw active duty in the coast patrol, operating in the Gulf of Mexico. Assigned to the U. S. S. Luckenbach and made several trips in convoy work. IN FLANDERS FIELDS

(AN ANSWER)

By R. W. Lillard

REST ye in peace, ye Flanders dead!
The fight that ye so bravely led We've taken up! And we will keep
True faith with you who lie asleep,
With each a cross to mark his bed,
And poppies blowing overhead
Where once his own life blood ran red!
So let your rest be sweet and deep
In Flanders fields!

Fear not that ye have died for naught;
The torch ye threw to us we caught!
Ten million hands will hold it high,
And Freedom's light shall never die!
We've learned the lesson that ye taught
In Flanders fields!

“To the Rescue”

Military, Naval and Air Section

OUR VARIED SERVICE

Exclusive of a few companies and one division, there were no other units or organizations in the army in which the men and officers from Knox County were gathered distinctively and into large groups during the war. Through assignment and transfer, as well as on account of the different times at which they entered the service of the government in its multitude of branches, the large majority of those who went to war from this city and county—above 4,000 in number—were scattered throughout all the arms of our military and naval forces.

To understand thoroughly this diffusion and wide separation of men in the army, a condition which applied to every section and locality, it will be necessary to trace briefly the growth of our military forces under the stress of a great emergency. In its expansion from a small, compact organization of about 190,000 in time of peace, with virtually only four distinct branches—infantry, artillery, cavalry and engineering—to a huge, multiplex organization of more than 3,500,000 men under arms, our army underwent a complete transformation. Quite as striking as its growth in numbers was the increase in the variety and complexity of special services and special branches, made necessary by the waging of war under new conditions and at a great distance from home.

As an illustration, the motor transport service, which was quite unknown before this war as a distinct organization, was almost as large in numbers on the day the armistice with Germany was concluded as our whole army was before the war began. The air service had more than 200,000 men and officers assigned to it. The chemical warfare branch required the employment of almost a division for its special work.

The units of the national guard divisions were organized before this great expansion took place. The individual companies were recruited from the same town or section. They were composed of men who had been boys together, who knew each other intimately, and whose officers were men whose leadership they accepted. When the call into federal service on August 5, 1917 came, and they went away to training camps, the same basic organization was maintained. There were some infusions of draft troops in the fall of 1917 to bring these companies up to the new war strength, but the personnel remained largely the same throughout the war. When the fighting was over, the men returned home in the same companies and same regiments, for the most part, with which they had departed two years before. The companies had the same nucleus with which they went away to war.

Quite the reverse was true of the men who were in the regular and national army divisions. After the declaration of war, the regular army regiments were expanded into three regiments each. Each of them was made up of one-third veterans and two-thirds recruits or drafted men. Many of the old men in the original regiments were transferred to the national army divisions as commissioned and non-commissioned officers. They were scattered throughout the United States to assist in the training of the new men.

After the organization of the first national army divisions, this dispersion of men from the same section became even greater. This was due to two entirely different causes, whose full effect became in evidence during the spring and summer months of 1918, when the majority of all the men drafted were called to the colors.

The national guard and regular army divisions, which were selected to go to France first because of their earlier training, began to suffer casualties and to dwindle in strength after a few weeks in the trenches. There was need constantly of a large reservoir of man power from which replacements could be drawn periodically to fill these divisions. It was found better policy to refill them in this way than to create new divisions to take their place in the line. To meet this situation and to keep a steady flow of men to France to fill the gaps, infantry and artillery replacement camps were established in this country to train men for this work. Instead of becoming a component part of some new division, the draft boards sent large groups of men directly to these camps, from which they were scattered throughout the combat divisions in France.

Under this policy, Knox County men filtered into regular army, national guard and national army combat divisions. They were as likely to be assigned to a regiment of Californians or New Yorkers as to one of the Tennessee units. They were used wherever the needs of the moment were greatest. Sectional lines and previous residence were disregarded absolutely in the assignment of troops. The War Department recognized this gradual amalgamation of the three grand divisions of the combat forces of the army and ordered that all officers and men should wear the same collar insignia, the large "U. S."

There was another factor which added to this dispersion of men from the same county, state and section. By the spring of 1918, all the numerous special branches and services in the army had been organized on a skeleton basis. Men of special, technical training were needed to fill them to their proper strength. The government permitted men of this type with these special qualifications, even though they were registered and subject to call later into the service, to enlist in those branches for which they were fitted best. Regular calls were sent out from Washington to the draft boards, asking for men of this quality. Hundreds of Knox Countians came under this classification and rendered their service to the government in this way.

Finally, to complete the thorough dispersion of men of the same city or county, the local draft boards were ordered to send recruits to many different camps over the country. In the beginning of the operation of the draft law, Knox County boards sent these men only to Camp Gordon. But in the heavy calls of the summer months of 1918, men were ordered to Camp Sevier, Camp Shelby, Camp Greene, Camp Jackson, Camp Taylor, Camp Sherman, and other cantonments.

Examination of the personal war records of the men, whose photographs are shown elsewhere in this volume, will reveal the fact that there was hardly a division in our army, a camp in this country, or a single one of the branches of the service, in which there were not a few Knox Countians. They were throughout the majority of the combat divisions; in the infantry, artillery, cavalry, quartermaster corps, and engineering branches; in the motor transport service, the many phases of railroad work in France, in the staff schools and staff headquarters; in mobile ordnance repair shops, in pioneer regiments, labor battalions; cooking and baking schools, gas and flame service, and in the many subdivisions of the service of supply.

This diversity of service both at home and abroad has made it next to impossible, therefore, to sketch in one volume, or even in many volumes, the history of the organizations of all the men from Knox County who played some part, either large or small, in the greatest of all wars. Such a history would be a complete story of the war in all its phases and of the battle actions of many companies, regiments and divisions. Its scope would be so extensive as to preclude its treatment in a volume of this size. The personal records of the Knox County men, which are given later, tell the principal facts of their military careers and of their military service.

The fighting operations of the majority of these men, however, are comprised in the St. Mihiel and Argonne Forest battles, which constitute the distinctive, offensive accomplishment and contribution of the American Expeditionary Forces in winning the war. Several divisions, sooner or later, were stationed elsewhere, either entirely or in part throughout the fighting, but always under the British or French High Command. They made glorious records on whatever front or in whatever sector it was their lot to be engaged. The Thirtieth and Twenty-seventh divisions fought side by side with the British throughout their service in France. The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Forty-second divisions took a very weighty and active part under the French during June and July, 1918, in checking the German drive toward Paris, while their assistance in the counter-offensive of Marshal Foch, beginning July 18, was the main factor in causing the German evacuation of the Marne salient.

The St. Mihiel and Argonne battles, however, stand out above all the engagements of the American forces during the war, because they were fought in American sectors, under American leadership, and largely by American troops. The larger number of our combat divisions, twenty-four out of the twenty-nine which had battle experience, engaged in one or both of these great offensive operations.

To describe at some length these battles, together with the operations of the Thirtieth Division in Belgium and in the Somme offensive, should include, then, in a general way the principal activities on the front of the men from Knox County who were privileged to have a part in the fighting. Reference to the accompanying maps will make clear some of the difficulties that they encountered, show what parts of the line were held by the divisions of which Knox Countians were members, and the strategy which the American and allied commanders employed in accomplishing their ends and bringing the Germans to their knees.

The same conditions, which operated to separate and scatter the men who went into the army, also applied to those who went into the navy, air service and the marines. In no camp, training station, naval base or battle fleet were there gathered more than a handful of men who were from this city or county. Yet they served with the same fidelity, endured the same hardships, made the same sacrifices that their brothers did who fortunately were grouped together in larger numbers and in distinctive units. Only their personal records will ever reveal the quiet, unostentatious service they rendered. No class of men worked so hard, so long hours, or were so constantly exposed to danger as the men in the navy. Yet there was little of the spectacular in their work which brought them before the public eye like the soldiers who took part in some memorable battle.

This great majority of Knox Countians, who were submerged in the different varieties of war service, returned home as they left. They came by ones and twos and threes. Some were discharged a few days after the armistice was signed. Most of them were mustered out during the spring and summer of 1919. A few, who were in the last divisions to leave Germany as part of the army of occupation, did not receive their discharges for nearly a year after fighting had ceased. There was no blare of trumpets or reception committees to meet them. They came in quietly, and, after a few days of rest, went back to the occupations and professions in which they were engaged before war called them to their country's standard. They had done their full duty. They were glad to lay aside the livery and pursuit of war and return to the labors of peace.

MAJOR-GENERAL E.M. LEWIS
COMMANDER, 30TH DIVISION

THIRTIETH DIVISION

(OFFICIAL HISTORY)

The Thirtieth Division was a distinctively American division. More than 95 per cent of its personnel was of American-born parents. The division was constituted of National Guard troops of North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee, augmented by many thousands of selective draft troops from the states of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee.

The division was dubbed "Old Hickory" after the warrior and statesman, Andrew Jackson, who was so closely identified with the history of the states furnishing the major portion of its personnel.

The Old Hickory Division landed at the port of Calais, France on the 24th day of May, 1918, and was billeted in the Eperlocques Training Area. While in this area the officers of the division reconnoitered the Terdeghe Switch Line, south of Cassel, and complete plans were formulated for the occupation of this line by forced marches in case of emergency.

Before the completion of its training period, the division was transferred to the II British Corps, Second Army, in the Ypres sector to be in close support in case of the expected German offensive. This division, the first American division to enter that kingdom, marched into Belgium on July 4th, with Division Headquarters at Watou, to be in close support of the 33rd and 49th British Divisions, and was employed in completing the construction of the East and West Poperinghe Defense Systems immediately in rear of these two divisions. An immense amount of trench and wire construction was done. Complete plans and orders were issued for the occupation of the East and West Poperinghe Systems by the 30th Division in the event of a German attack and a forced withdrawal of the British Divisions in the front. The division received training in the front line with the 33rd and 49th Divisions, first as individuals, then by platoons, and lastly by entire battalions.

On August 17, 1918, the division took over the entire sector occupied by the 33rd British Division, 60th Brigade being in the front line, 59th Brigade in support. This was known as the Canal Sector and extended from the southern outskirts of Ypres to the vicinity of Voormezele, a distance of 2,400 metres.

On August 31 and September 1 the division engaged in an offensive in conjunction with the 14th British Division on the left and 27th American Division on the right. The 30th Division captured all its objectives, including Lock No. 8, Lankhof Farm, and the City of Voormezele, advancing fifteen hundred yards, capturing fifteen prisoners, two machine-guns and thirty-five rifles. As a result of this advance the 236th Division, which was considered an average German division, was identified. During the six weeks previous to this advance, many attempts had been made by the British and our own troops to identify this German division.

On September 4-5, the division was withdrawn from the Canal Sector and placed in British G. H. Q. reserve with Division Headquarters at Roelkecourt, France. While in this area the entire division was trained in attacking in conjunction with British tanks. On September 17, the division was again moved farther south with Division Headquarters at Herissart, and on September 22 was moved to the British Fourth Army with Division Headquarters at Bois de Buire, near Tincourt, taking over a front line sector from the 1st Australian Division on the night of September 23-24.

September 29 this division, with the 27th American Division on the left and the 46th British Division on the right, assaulted the Hindenburg Line. The Hindenburg Line at this point curved in front of the Tunnel of St. Quentin. This was considered impregnable by the Germans for the following reasons: The Hindenburg Line, curving west of the tunnel, consisted of three main trench systems protected by vast fields of heavy barbed wire entanglements skillfully placed. This wire was very heavy and had been damaged very little by artillery fire. The dominating ground enabled them to bring devastating machine-gun fire on all approaches. The lines had been strengthened with concrete machine-gun emplacements. It contained at this point a large number of dugouts, lined with mining timbers, with wooden steps leading down to a depth of about 30 feet and with small rooms capable of holding from four to six men each. In many cases, these dugouts were wired for electric light. The large tunnel, through which the canal ran, was of sufficient capacity to shelter a division. This tunnel was electrically lighted and filled with barges. Connecting it with the Hindenburg trench system were numerous tunnels. In one case a direct tunnel ran from the main tunnel to the basement of a large stone building, which the enemy used for headquarters. Other tunnels ran from the main tunnel eastward to the City of Bellicourt and other places. This complete subterranean system with its hidden exits and entrances, unknown to us, formed a most complete and safe subterranean method of communication and reinforcement for the German sector.

The Thirtieth Division, 60th Brigade, augmented by units of the 117th Infantry, attacking, assaulted this line at 5:50 a. m., September 29, on a front of three thousand yards, captured the entire Hindenburg System of that sector and advanced farther, capturing the tunnel system with the German troops therein; took the Cities of Bellicourt, Nauroy, Riqueval, Carriere, Etricourt, Guillaime Ferme and Ferme de Riqueval, advancing four thousand, two hundred yards, defeating two enemy divisions of average quality, (the 75th Reserve Division and the 185th Division), and taking as prisoners 47 officers and 1,434 men.

On October 1-2, the division was relieved by the 5th Australian Division and moved to a back area with division headquarters at Herbecourt. The division scarcely reached this area when it was marched back and took over the front line in the same sector from the 2nd Australian Division near Montbrehain on the night of October 4-5.

From October 8-11, the division attacked each day, advancing 17,500 yards, and capturing le Tilleul d'Archies, le Petit Cambresis, Becquigny, Mon. Sarasin, le Trou Aux Soldats, Busigny, Gloriette, le Vert Donjon, Escaufourt, le Rond

Pont, Vaux-Andigny, Vallee Hasard, la Haie Menneresse, la Rochelle, le Vent de Bise, St. Souplet, St. Benin, Malassise, Geneve, half of Montbrehain, Brancourt, Premont, Vaux-le-Pretre, Brancoucourt, Fraicourt Ferme, Bois Mirand, Butry Ferme, la Sabliere Bois, Becquignette Ferme, Bois de Malmaison, Malmaison Ferme, Bois de Busigny, Bois l'Ermitage, Bois Proyard, Imberfayt and Du Guet Fassiaux Fermes, taking prisoners 45 officers and 1,889 men. The 59th Brigade began this attack on October 8 and captured all their objectives, including Premont and Brancourt. During this operation from October 8-11, the 30th Division encountered units from fourteen German divisions, classified by the British High Command as follows: 34th Division, average; 20th Division, very good; 24th Division, very good; 21st Division, average; 21st Reserve Division, average; 38th Division, very good; 119th Division, average; 121st Division, average; 187th Sharpshooting Section, very good; 204th Division, average; 208th Division, average; 3rd Naval Division, very good; 15th Reserve Division, average.

The 30th Division was relieved by the 27th Division on October 11-12, but returned on October 16 and took over a part of the same line at the same place, being the right half of the sector temporarily held by the 27th. The next attack was launched on October 17-19 against the 221st Division, average; 243rd Division, average; 29th Division, very good, advancing nine thousand yards and capturing 6 officers and 412 men, and the towns of Molain, St.-Martin Riviere, Ribeaucourt, Ecaillon, Mazinghein and Ribeaucourt Ferme.

During much of the fighting from October 8-11 and October 17-19, difficulties of the terrain were very great, with the country greatly broken by small patches of woods, while villages, with uneven terrain and occasional large towns, admirably added to the machine-gun defense of which the Germans took every advantage. The Selle River with high banks beyond was obstinately defended. In spite of these difficulties the advance continued, often without artillery support, and was made possible only by the determination of the men and the skillful use of all arms combined with clever utilization of the diversified terrain. The 3rd German Naval Division of the crack German divisions was hastily thrown in in an attempt to stop the advance.

The division was then withdrawn to the Heilly Training Area, near Amiens, for replacements and a well-earned rest. Two weeks later, when orders for an immediate return to the front were expected daily, the armistice with Germany was signed November 11, 1918. The fighting being over, the II American Corps was released from the British E. F., with which it had been associated since its arrival in France, and transferred to the American E. F. in the Le Mans area, where the first units of the 30th Division arrived and Divisional Headquarters opened at Ballon on November 21.

During the above operations the advance was so rapid and the troops withdrawn so soon, there was no opportunity to gather up and salvage a great number of guns and supplies captured, which were left for the salvage troops of the Fourth British Army. Upon a partial check by the units of the division, it is known that at least 72 field artillery pieces, 26 trench mortars, 426 machine guns and 1,792 rifles were captured in addition to the great mass of material. This represents but a portion of the captures. In many instances, field guns taken from the Germans were turned over to the supporting artillery and used by them upon the retreating enemy.

Total number of prisoners captured by this division from September 29 to October 20 were: 98 officers, 3,750 men. During the same period we lost 3 officers and 24 men as prisoners. The total casualties of the entire division, according to statistics of the War Department, were 1,652 killed and 9,429 wounded. The division stood eleventh in the army in the number of casualties.

"KING GEORGE REVIEWING THE THIRTIETH"

The King and General Lewis are seen talking in the foreground. To the left, and with strap under his chin, is Col. Cary F. Spence, of the 117th Infantry. Behind King George is General Faison.

The following messages and orders speak for themselves:

AUSTRALIAN CORPS

Corps Headquarters,
2nd October, 1918.

My Dear General:

As the II American Corps has now been withdrawn from the line, and my official association with you and your troops has been, for the time being, suspended, I desire to express to you the great pleasure that it has been to me, and to the troops of the Australian Army Corps to have been so closely allied to you in the recent very important battle operations which have resulted in the breaking through of the main Hindenburg Line on the front of the Fourth British Army.

Now that fuller details of the work done by the 27th and 30th American Divisions have become available, the splendid gallantry and devotion of the troops in these operations have won the admiration of their Australian comrades. The tasks set were formidable, but the American troops overcame all obstacles and contributed in a very high degree to the ultimate capture of the whole tunnel system.

I shall be glad if you will convey to your Division Commanders my appreciation of and thanks for the work done, and to accept my best wishes for every possible success in the future.

Yours very sincerely,
JOHN MONASH,
Commanding Australian Corps.

To: Major-General G. W. Read,
Comd'g., II American Corps.

October 9th, 1918.

Major-General G. W. Read,
II American Corps.

On this first occasion on which the II American Corps has taken part in battle of its own, I desire to convey to you, General Read, and all members of your staff as well as to all other ranks of the Thirtieth Division, my hearty congratulations on your victory today. The gallantry of your infantry and the precision with which all staff arrangements have worked has filled me with admiration and it has given me pleasure to report your unqualified success to Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig.

HENRY RAWLINSON,
General, Commanding Fourth British Army.

Major-General G. W. Read,
II American Corps.

October 12, 1918.

The Commander-in-Chief desires you to convey to the officers and soldiers of your Corps his appreciation of the magnificent qualities which have enabled them, against powerful resistance, to advance more than ten miles and to take more than six thousand prisoners since September twenty-seven.

McANDREWS.

Major-General G. W. Read,
II American Corps.

October 20, 1918.

I wish to express to you personally, and to all the officers and men serving under you, my warm appreciation of the very valuable and gallant services rendered by you throughout the recent operations with the 4th British Army. Called up to attack positions of great strength held by a determined enemy, all ranks of the 27th and 30th Divisions under your command displayed an energy, courage and determination in attack which proved irresistible. It does not need me to tell you that in the heavy fighting of the past three weeks you have earned the lasting esteem and admiration of your British comrades-in-arms whose success you have so nobly shared.

D. HAIG,
Field Marshal.

October 22nd, 1918.

II American Corps:

Now that the American Corps has come out of the line for a well-earned period of rest and training, I desire to place on record my appreciation of the gallantry and the fine soldierly spirit they have displayed throughout the recent hard fighting.

The breaking of the great Hindenburg System of defense, coupled with the capture of Brancourt, Busigny and St. Souplet, and finally the forcing of the passages of the Selle river, constitute a series of victories of which each officer, N. C. O. and man has every reason to feel proud.

The Corps has been very well supported by the artillery of the Australian Corps, to whom I desire to offer my best thanks for their skill and endurance during the long months they have now been in action.

The efficiency with which the staff work of the Corps has been carried out on this their first experience as a fighting Corps in the line of battle has filled me with admiration, and I attribute it largely to the zeal and unity of purpose which has throughout animated the whole Corps.

The outstanding feature of their recent victories has been the surpassing gallantry and self-sacrifice of the regimental officers and men. I congratulate them on their prowess and offer them, one and all, my warmest thanks for the leading part they have taken in the recent operations.

It is possible now to give the Corps a period of rest, during which special attention should be paid to the training of the smaller units in minor tactics, such as the attack of strong points and machine gun nests. The experience they have had of actual combat will assist them to improve their fighting efficiency in this respect.

In thanking the Corps as a whole for the great services they have rendered to the Allied cause, I desire to wish all ranks the best good fortune in the future.

RAWLINSON,
Commanding 4th British Army.

Busigny, October 27, 1918.

Commanding General, 30th Division:

Acting as a representative of the commune and in its name, consequently in the name, too, of a part of France, I take the liberty to come and express to our liberator and to the gallant troops under your command our feelings of deepest and eternal gratitude.

For those who have not been submitted, as we have, for four years, to the intolerable and abhorred German yoke, it is difficult to realize how great were the relief, the joy, the well-being, in a word the unexpressible happiness, we all felt when the first Allied troops made their way through our village, and this great event has been for us like the dawn of a resurrection.

I should be very thankful to you if you would convey to all your officers, N. C. O's. and men under your command, our deep feelings of admiration and eternal gratitude.

Please, Sir, accept the expression of my highest consideration, and believe me,

Yours most devotedly,

The Mayor of Busigny,
E. MAIRIS.

November 15th, 1918.

Commanding General, 30th Division:

1. Referring to the telegram from the Commander-in-Chief of appreciation of the sacrifice and service of the troops of the American Expeditionary Force, I feel that it should be impressed upon the men of our command that they, and the organizations to which they belong, have played an exceptional part in bringing about the magnificent results which the Commander-in-chief has so warmly eulogized, and that every advantage should be taken of this expression of what has been done in the past and confidence as to the future by those in command to inspire their men with pride in the service they have had as soldiers in the Army of the United States, and to keep alive this "proud consciousness of a new Americanism born of sacrifice."

2. I would request that you convey to your command my appreciation of the part they have taken in our great victory, and my thanks for their heroic devotion to duty; and that I share with them their sorrow for fallen comrades, and their pride in the high achievements of the men of this Corps.

G. W. READ.

Major-General, Commanding II Corps.

November 16th, 1918.

Commanding General, II American Corps:

Now that the II American Corps is leaving the British zone, I wish once more to thank you and all officers, non-commissioned officers and men under your command, on behalf both of myself and all ranks of the British Armies, in France and Flanders, for the very gallant and efficient service you have rendered during the period of your operations with the Fourth British Army.

On the 29th of September, you took part with distinction in the great and critical attack which shattered the enemy's resistance in the Hindenburg Line and opened the road to final victory. The deeds of the 27th and 30th American Divisions who on that day took Bellicourt and Nauroy and so gallantly sustained the desperate struggle for Bony, will rank with the highest achievements of this war. They will always be remembered by the British Regiments that fought beside you.

Since that date, through three weeks of almost continuous fighting, you advanced from one success to another, overcoming all resistance, beating off numerous counter-attacks, and capturing several thousand prisoners and many guns. The names of Brancourt, Premont, Busigny, Vaux-Andigny, St.-Souplet and Mazinghein testify to the dash and energy of your attacks.

I rejoice at the success which has attended your efforts and I am proud to have had you under my command.

(Signed) D. HAIG,
Field Marshal.

GENERAL LAWRENCE D. TYSON

In rank, length of service, and experience in military affairs, General Tyson stands at the head of the national guardsmen of Tennessee. His military career reached its apex in his command of the Fifty-ninth Infantry Brigade, of the Thirtieth Division, during the World War. For the splendid manner in which he handled it in its operations on one of the most difficult parts of the front he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal by the War Department upon the recommendation of General Pershing.

General Tyson's career as a soldier began in 1883 when he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Ninth United States Infantry, after he had completed the four-year course at the West Point Military Academy. He remained as an officer of the regular army until 1896, when he resigned to come to Knoxville to reside and enter business. When war with Spain arose, General Tyson volunteered his services and was made colonel of the Sixth Volunteer Infantry. With his regiment he saw service in Porto Rico. After the declaration of war against Germany, Governor Rye recognized General Tyson's military ability by commissioning him brigadier general of the Tennessee volunteer troops. In the reorganization of the national guard troops of Tennessee, North Carolina and South Carolina, into the Thirtieth Division, General Tyson was placed in command of the Fifty-ninth Infantry Brigade. He accompanied it to France and led it in its battles in the Ypres sector in Belgium and in the attack on the Hindenburg Line, together with the bitter engagements which followed it in the succeeding three weeks.

FIFTY-NINTH BRIGADE

The Fifty-ninth Infantry Brigade of the Thirtieth Division, organized at Camp Sevier, S. C., in September, 1917, was composed of the 117th and 118th Infantry regiments and the 114th Machine Gun Battalion. The 117th Infantry originally was the Third Tennessee Infantry, the 118th Infantry was the former First South Carolina Infantry, while the machine gun battalion was made up of Troops A, B, C, Tennessee cavalry, from Nashville, Chattanooga and Athens, respectively. To bring them up to war strength in accordance with the revised tables of organization, there were large infusions of draft men into each unit of the brigade in the fall of 1917. These men were largely from Tennessee and the Middle West. They made most excellent soldiers.

The first commander of the brigade was Gen. W. S. Scott. He was succeeded soon after its organization by Gen. Lawrence D. Tyson, of Knoxville, who went to Camp Sevier as the head of all the Tennessee national guard troops. Gen. Tyson commanded the brigade through its period of training at Camp Sevier, in all of its operations overseas, and until it was mustered out of service in April, 1919. Though most brigades went through a series of changes in the personnel of their higher commanders during the war, the Fifty-ninth was peculiarly an exception in this respect. Gen. Tyson remained with it during its entire service. So also did Lieut.-Col. Thomas J. Wyrick, brigade adjutant, and Lieuts. Rye and Milburn, Gen. Tyson's aides. Colonel Spence commanded the 117th Infantry from its organization until its discharge, but Col. Peter K. McCulley was succeeded by Col. Orrin R. Wolfe in France as commander of the 118th Infantry. Major J. Perry Fyffe, who was the first commander of the machine gun battalion, was relieved by Major E. B. Cantey after the brigade's arrival overseas.

Movement of the brigade from Camp Sevier, where it trained for approximately eight months after its organization, began early in May, 1918. The route taken was by New York to Liverpool, across England, and then by the English Channel to Calais, France. Before the end of the month all units of the brigade were in France and under the intensive training of English instructors. On July 4 the brigade moved forward into Belgium, the first American troops to enter the little country. The division remained in support of the 33rd and 49th British Divisions for several days, but units up to the battalion went into the battle line for real experience. The Thirtieth Division finally took over the Canal Sector from the 33rd British on August 17, and the brigade thereafter saw front line duty daily until its withdrawal.

During the period in Belgium, which was largely spent in accustoming the regiments to trench warfare and in training them for the big offensive a month later in the Somme area, the casualties of the brigade were very light. They included two officers killed, four officers wounded, four enlisted men killed, five died of wounds, and fifty-six wounded, a total of 71 for the operations in Belgium.

The brigade was withdrawn from the Canal Sector September 4-5 and placed in reserve for a short course in training with tanks. Two weeks later the final move in preparation for the big offensive between St. Quentin and Cambrai was made, and on September 23 the brigade took over the line just west of Bellicourt from the First Australian Division. The 118th Infantry went into the front lines, with the 117th Infantry in support. They were relieved shortly before the attack by the 60th Brigade.

The plan of battle was that the Sixtieth Brigade, plus Company H, of the 117th Infantry, and the 114th Machine Gun Battalion, should attack on the divisional front, penetrate the barbed wire entanglements, and capture Belli-court and Nauroy. Its elements were to have the protection of a creeping barrage and be preceded by a strong array of tanks. The Fifty-ninth Brigade was allotted the task of creating a divisional reserve and exploiting the line to the southeast after the St. Quentin Canal had been crossed. Exploitation of this territory was assigned to the 117th, while the 118th made up the divisional reserve.

The sector of attack for the division was considered the most strongly fortified part of the whole Hindenburg Line, which extended from the English Channel to the Swiss border. The defensive fortifications were thought to be the strongest that could possibly be erected and capable of withstanding any offense. In addition to the St. Quentin Canal, which reached a depth of 75 feet at places and some 150 feet in width, the Germans had built four series of trenches, each of which was protected by heavy barbed wire entanglements. It was through these obstacles that the assaulting waves had to pass. At the apex of the defenses of the German lines, and in front of Bellicourt, the canal ran through a tunnel, in which 30,000 troops could be billeted in safety. The approaches to the tunnel were made almost impregnable by numbers of machine guns, which commanded the canal both north and south. Furthermore, smaller tunnels made connection with many points of the trench system in front of the canal.

Two elements favored the attack. The first of these was an intense artillery preparation from hundreds of British and Australian guns. These played upon the enemy lines, but did little damage to the barbed wire. The other element was a heavy fog, which concealed the advance of the Americans and prevented the full effect of the German machine gun and rifle fire from playing upon them accurately. Undoubtedly, many of the companies became lost from each other and wandered from the direction of their objectives, but their losses were not so heavy as they would have been if the morning had been clear.

The crushing of the main defenses of the line and the cleaning up of machine gun nests continued throughout September 29 and the two succeeding days, when the brigade and division were relieved for a short time to rest and recuperate for further attacks. The brigade's casualties in the drive upon the Hindenburg Line, which stands out as one of the great battles of the war, were 854 out of a total strength of 7,661 men and officers. They were divided as follows: officers killed, 3; officers wounded, 37; men killed, 79; men died of wounds, 39; men wounded, 696.

The heaviest and bloodiest fighting of the brigade, however, was upon October 8 and 9. In these two days the towns of Geneve, Ponchaux, Montbrechain, Brancourt, Premont, Busigny, and Becquigny were captured, and an advance of close to 10,000 yards was made against the most determined resistance by the German divisions with machine guns, artillery, and infantry. The attack was taken up on October 10 and 11 by the Sixtieth Brigade. On October 12 the Thirtieth Division was relieved by the Twenty-seventh American Division for a brief rest. However, the Thirtieth was called back on October 16, and the following morning the Fifty-ninth Brigade again took up the battle against the enemy. It captured Molain and advanced across the Selle River before it was relieved by the Sixtieth Brigade, which continued the fighting until the afternoon of October 19.

From October 5 to 19, inclusive, covering this hard fighting beyond the Hindenburg Line, the brigade suffered 2,571 casualties. Of 194 officers, 22 were killed, 1 died of wounds, and 66 were wounded. From the enlisted personnel of the brigade, comprising 6,857 men, 382 were killed, 56 died of wounds, and 2,044 were wounded. Summarizing the casualties of the brigade from the time it went into the line until it was finally withdrawn, the total killed and wounded of officers and enlisted men was 3,496, or 45.5 per cent of the brigade's strength. The units of the brigade advanced approximately 19,700 yards for a penetration of about 11 miles into the lines of the enemy.

While exact figures are impossible because of the rapidity of the advance and the fierceness of the fighting, yet a fairly accurate count of the spoils taken by the brigade in its operations in the line shows the following: prisoners captured, 2736; field pieces taken, 65; machine guns captured, 446; rifles and other small arms, 4171; trench mortars, 72; anti-tank guns, 25; bicycles, 200; anti-aircraft guns, 5; minnenwerfers, 3; and square miles of territory taken, 18.2. In the attack on the Hindenburg Line and the operations that followed it, the following advances were made: jumping-off line to St. Quentin Canal, 1,900 yards; St. Quentin Canal to objective on September 29, 2,400 yards; operations of October 7, 8, and 9, 9,800 yards; operations of October 17 and 18, 5,600 yards.

Exhausted by the long siege of fighting, the brigade was withdrawn with the rest of the division to the Heilly training area near Amiens on October 20. Replacements for the thinned ranks were to be drawn and men and officers were to be given a few days of rest before returning to the fighting again. Just when orders were expected for a return to the front, the armistice was signed and all fighting ceased. Toward the end of November orders were received from American General Headquarters to entrain for the Le Mans area. There the brigade remained until early in March, 1919, when it again entrained for St. Nazaire, where boats were waiting to transport its units to the United States. Landing was made at Charleston, South Carolina, during the last days of that month. The 118th Infantry was mustered out at Camp Jackson, but the 117th Infantry and the 114th Machine Gun Battalion, after great parades through Knoxville, Nashville and Chattanooga, were demobilized at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, about the middle of April, 1919.

Recognition of the splendid fighting qualities of the brigade is shown in the number of medals, crosses and citations bestowed upon it. General Tyson was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal by General Pershing for his sterling leadership during the battle activities of the brigade. One officer and seven men received the Congressional Medal, the highest and most coveted military honor that our government bestows. No other brigade in the history of the army has been awarded so many. Fifteen officers were decorated with the Distinguished Service Cross, while the same award was made to 69 enlisted men of the Brigade. British Military Crosses were bestowed upon 21 officers, and the British Military Medal conferred upon 54 men of the enlisted personnel. The Distinguished Conduct Medal was granted to 31 men. Citations for personal bravery were given to 57 officers and 250 men by Major-General Lewis, the division commander.

The brigade upon its return was a far different organization from what it was when its members left their homes nearly two years before. They came back battle-scarred veterans, bronzed and hardened from twenty months of service in the open under sun and rain, enduring the hardships of heat and cold. They served their apprenticeship in the school of war at Camp Sevier, where they hewed their camp and drill grounds out of pine forests and learned the rudiments of warfare from American and British instructors. They became masters of the art in the three months in which they were thrown against the best troops of the hitherto victorious German armies. They were at home equally in trench or in open warfare, able to cope with any foe they met, recognized as the peer of any troops on either side, and regarded as the superior of most of them.

COLONEL CARY F. SPENCE

The military career of Colonel Spence extends over a period of more than two decades. It began with the Spanish-American war in 1898, when he was commissioned first lieutenant and appointed regimental adjutant of the Sixth Volunteer Infantry. He was promoted to the rank of Captain the following year while on duty in Porto Rico.

After the close of the war, Colonel Spence did not allow his interest in military affairs to lapse, but continued to be an active factor in Tennessee national guard circles. This lively participation in military matters led to his choice later as colonel of the Third Tennessee Infantry. When war with Mexico threatened in 1916, he recruited the regiment to full strength and led it to the border, where it saw nearly a year of service on guard duty.

Colonel Spence's most active war service, however, was in the World War, through which he led the 117th Infantry. He accompanied it to Camp Sevier in September, 1917; directed its training in preparation for overseas duty; was its active commander through all the fighting in Belgium, the attack upon the Hindenburg Line, and the several battles which followed; and he brought home the regiment in the spring of 1919 to be mustered out. In recognition of his leadership, Colonel Spence was cited in divisional orders by Major-General Lewis, while he was also the recipient of special honor from General Pershing in the form of a citation for his work upon the Western Front.

THE 117th INFANTRY

The Third Tennessee Infantry, as the 117th Infantry was known in state service, was a veteran organization when President Wilson called the national guard into federal service as a part of the great army that was to fight Germany. The regiment had spent nine months on the Mexican border, patrolling our southern boundary to prevent trouble with our neighbors. The regiment left Knoxville June 16, 1916, and did not return home until March 20, 1917, to be mustered out. A few weeks later, following the declaration of war, the Third Tennessee was again sworn into state service and ten days later into the service of the federal government.

An active recruiting campaign was conducted to raise the companies to full strength. At the same time, infantry foot drill and physical exercises were given daily to put the men in good physical trim and training. Recruiting and drilling were carried on simultaneously until the regiment assembled at Knoxville and departed for Camp Sevier, S. C., early in September, 1917. There, in the organization of the Thirtieth Division, it was designated the 117th Infantry of the 59th Brigade.

The personnel of the officers of the regiment, together with the localities from which the companies were recruited, was as follows: Colonel Cary F. Spence, commanding, Knoxville; Lieutenant-Colonel Charles F. Brown, Chattanooga; Headquarters Company, of Knoxville, Captain Thomas J. Wyrick; Supply Company, of Knoxville, Captain Roscoe A. D. Stanis, 2nd Lieut. John A. Skelton; Machine Gun Company, of Knoxville, Captain Robert A. McMillan, 1st Lieut. James N. Condon, 2nd Lieut. James C. Compton, 2nd Lieut. Neal A. Reynolds.

First Battalion—Major Charles W. Dyer, Knoxville; 1st Lieut. Oscar J. B. Whitehurst; Company A, of Knoxville, Captain Ernest W. Andes, 1st Lieut. Fred W. Fritts, 2nd Lieut. George P. Howard; Company B, of Maryville and Knoxville, Captain Emerson J. Lones, 1st Lieut. Wiley W. Boring, 2nd Lieut. Robert M. Lindsay; Company C, of Knoxville, Captain George A. Blair, 1st Lieut. Lynn Z. Morris, 2nd Lieut. George W. McMillan; Company D, of Knoxville, Captain Harry W. Curtis, Jr., 1st Lieut. Belmont Earle, 2nd Lieut. John Walker Leach.

Second Battalion—Major Caleb R. Hathaway, 1st Lieut. Robert W. Swatts; Company E, of Hampton, Captain Philip I. Brummit, 1st Lieut. Fred Baker, 2nd Lieut. Charles Mitchell; Company F, of Johnson City, Captain George H. Scott, 1st Lieut. Robey Williams, 2nd Lieut. Richard K. Gibson, Jr.; Company G, of Elizabethton, Captain E. C. Cass, 1st Lieut. Byrn H. Folsom, 2nd Lieut. Van Dyke Ochs; Company H, of Bristol, Captain W. A. Buckles, 1st Lieut. George Burrow, 2nd Lieut. Joseph Morton.

Third Battalion—Major Dan M. Ellis, 1st Lieut. Ernest Brown; Company I, of Athens, Captain Nathaniel Callen, 1st Lieut. Glenn Cauthron, 2nd Lieut. Rolfe Moody; Company K, of Chattanooga, Captain Ernest Bell, 1st Lieut. Harry L. Clark, 2nd Lieut. Amiel W. Brinkley; Company L, of Etowah, Captain David W. Lillard, 1st Lieut. Charles D. Walters, 2nd Lieut. William C. Boyd; Company M, of Tellico Plains, Captain Burley J. Pennington, 1st Lieut. Levi J. Moorehouse, 2nd Lieut. N. E. Ellis.

On leaving Knoxville the regiment had over 2,000 men. During the early fall of 1917, its strength was increased by the addition of 1676 drafted men at Camp Sevier. They came from Camp Gordon and were principally from Tennessee. However, about 350 men, picked from the entire regiment and chosen for special technical qualifications, were transferred from the 117th during the period of training at Camp Sevier and were ordered to special branches of the army in which their technical ability was needed. Their loss was more than taken care of by a quota of 500 draft men from the Middle West, who made a splendid addition to the regiment. Taking a general average of the service of the 117th, its enlisted personnel was about half draft and half volunteer. No difference or distinction was made between them, they worked into a homogeneous whole, and the honors won on the battlefield were divided about half and half between them.

The first part of the work at Camp Sevier was clearing a camp from a pine forest. All military drill was impossible until the large pine trees and undergrowth had been removed and the holes leveled. This hard physical work proved excellent for the men, as they hardened into fine condition and most of them gained in weight. After fair grounds had been prepared, a strenuous daily schedule of infantry drill was carried out, discipline stiffened, and during the winter and spring of 1918, instruction was given by English officers and non-commissioned officers in trench warfare. During the winter, which was a very severe one, one officer and twenty-nine enlisted men died from disease, principally pneumonia. During the eight months at Camp Sevier, all kinds of schools for officers and non-commissioned officers were held. Many of the officers went to other camps for training in special branches. Col. Spence and Lieut.-Col. Brown went to Fort Sam Houston for a course of several weeks for field officers.

Orders were received May 2, 1918, to entrain for duty overseas, and on the night of May 10, 1918, the regiment went on board transports at New York. Some ten days later, after an attack by submarines off the Irish Coast, in which the convoy escaped without loss, landing was made at Liverpool, England, where special trains carried the regiment straight through London to Folkestone. Transports ferried it across the English Channel by night to Calais, France. American equipment was turned in there and British was issued in its stead. The Thirtieth Division was one of seven American divisions which were concentrated in the British area for training and for use in case the Germans made their threatened drive for the Channel ports. The enemy was said to have 20 divisions at this time just back of Ypres, ready to make this attack, but their withdrawal was made necessary later by the allied resistance on other parts of the front.

The 117th proceeded from Calais to Norbecourt, where, under British officers and non-commissioned officers, the officers and men of the regiment were trained strenuously for five weeks. Detachments went up from time to time to the Canal Sector, between Ypres and Mont Kemmel, for front line work. This was most important, for it gave the regiment some experience in actual warfare before it was ordered later to take over a part of the line. About July 1 the Thirtieth Division was ordered to move into Belgium. The 59th Brigade, which crossed the border on July 4, was the first unit of American forces to enter the war-torn little country, which bore the first assault of the German attack in the world war.

The 117th was assigned to Tunneling Camp, where it was given its final training in trench warfare and in attacking strong points. After a few days of this work, the regiment was ordered into the battle line. One battalion held the front line trenches, another was kept in support, while the third was held in reserve on the East Popperinghe Line. The battalions alternated in these positions for twenty-four days, each receiving the same amount of real front line work. On August 17, when it became evident that the Americans were fully able to handle the situation, the sector was turned over to the Thirtieth Division by the Thirty-third British Division, which had been stationed in the line there. The extent of the sector was from the southern outskirts of Ypres to Voormezele and was known as the Canal Sector.

With the exception of a limited offensive, conducted in cooperation with the British, in which Mont Kemmel was outflanked, Voormezele captured, and an advance of about 1500 yards made, the Thirtieth Division was purely on the defensive in all the fighting in Belgium. Yet this type of warfare was, perhaps, the most harassing through which it went during the whole war. The Germans knew the location of every trench and their artillery played upon them day and night. Night bombers also made this a very uncomfortable sector, for they dropped tons of explosives both upon the front and at the rear. There was little concealment on either side, because this part of Belgium was very flat. Artificial camouflage provided what little deception was practiced upon the enemy.

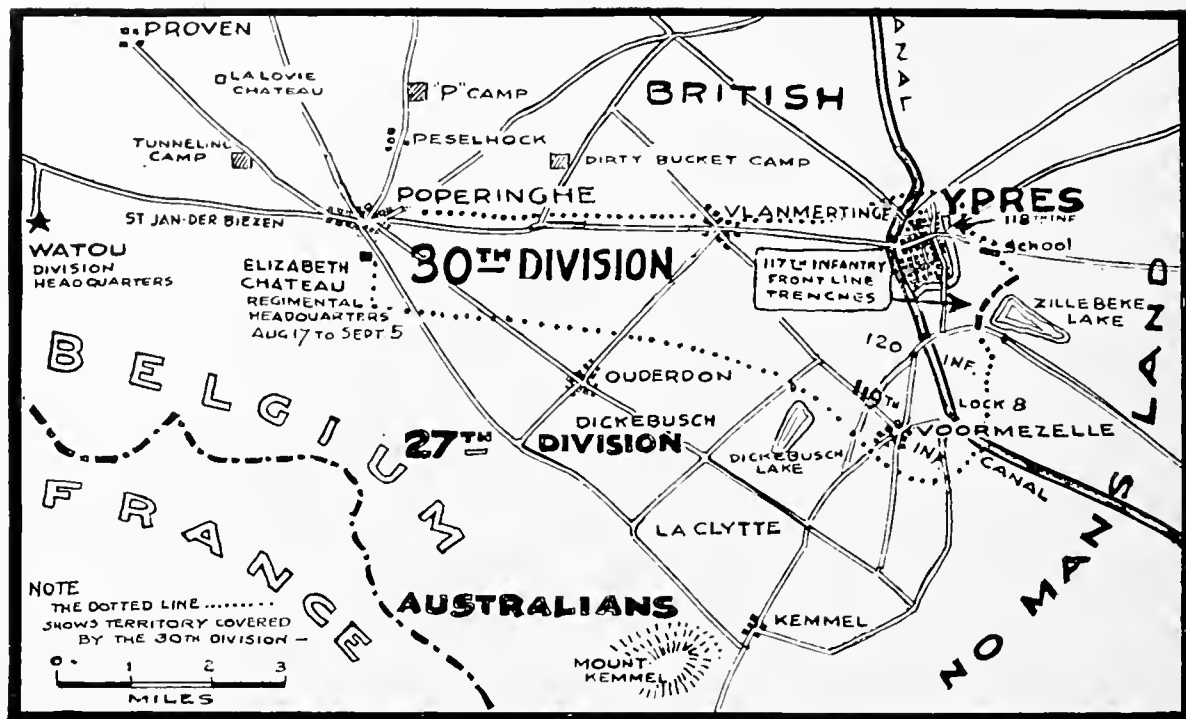

The casualties of the 117th in the two months in which it was stationed in the Canal Sector were not heavy. Only a few men were killed and the number of wounded was less than 100. King George of England and Field Marshal Haig, commander of the English armies, honored the regiment with a visit and made an inspection of its companies.

On the night of September 4, the 117th, together with the other units of the division, was withdrawn from the English Second Army and placed in British G. H. Q. reserve. The next two weeks were given to intensive training with tanks, with a view to coming offensive operations with them. September 18 trucks and busses were provided and the regiment moved through Albert, Bray and Peronne to near Tincourt, just back of the celebrated Hindenburg Line. The Thirtieth and Twenty-seventh Divisions, which were the only American divisions left with the British, were assigned now to the British Fourth Army, General Rawlinson commanding, for the great attack which was soon to be launched at this most vital and highly fortified part of the whole line. They were fresh, they had shown their mettle in the defensive operations in Belgium, and so they were chosen for the spearhead of the attack.

The 59th Brigade went into the line first, relieving the Australians on the night of September 26. The 118th Infantry took over the front line, with the 117th Infantry in close support. The casualties of the latter were rather heavy from gas shells in making the relief, one company losing 62 men to the hospital.

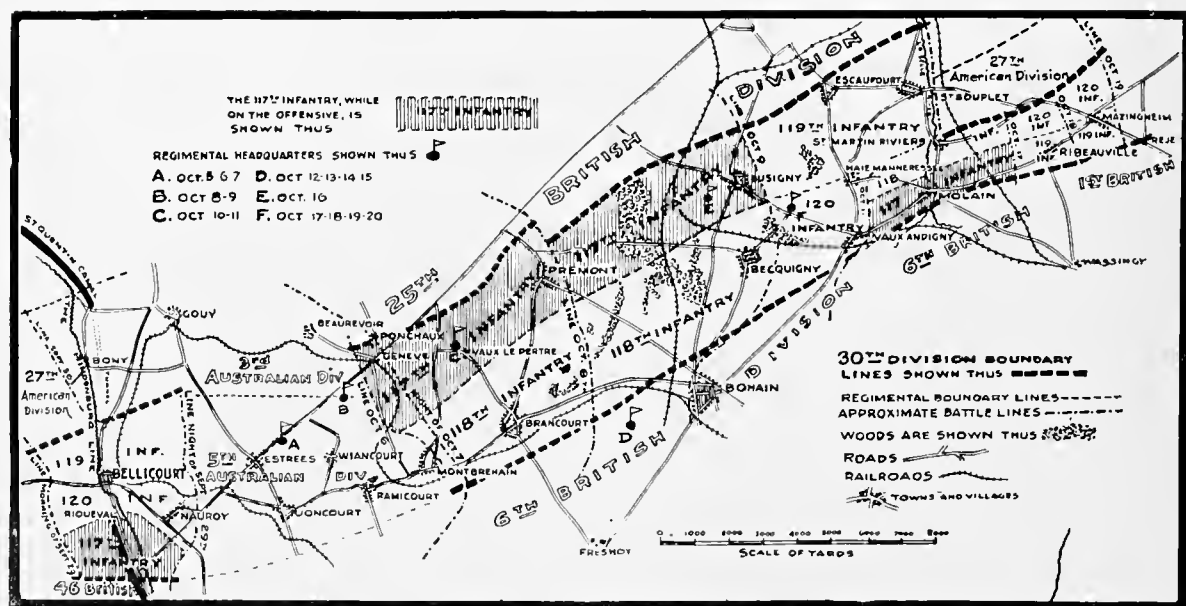

The celebrated Hindenburg Line, which the German commander-in-chief, General von Hindenburg, built as a great defensive system to hold against capture all of France and Belgium east of it, extended from the English Channel to the Swiss border. It was not a local defensive system at all. Yet at various parts of the line there were key positions, dominating a large area, the fortifications of which had been made much stronger. The area between St. Quentin and Cambria held the key to the German defenses on the northern end of the line. It was fortified accordingly with all the ingenuity and deviltry of the Hun mind.

In front of Bellicourt, near the center of the American sector of attack, the Hindenburg Line, which curved west of the St. Quentin Canal, consisted of three main trench systems, each protected by row after row of barbed wire entanglements. These trench systems were on high ground and gave the Germans the advantage of being able to sweep the whole area in front of them with machine guns. Along the canal were concrete machine gun emplacements. Back of this formidable system of defenses was the canal tunnel, built by Napoleon in 1802-10, and running underground for a distance of three miles. From this tunnel there were thirty-eight exits, each carefully camouflaged. The tunnel was lighted by electricity, a narrow gauge railroad brought in supplies from the outside, while canal boats provided quarters for a large number of men. Thus there was complete shelter for a large garrison of the enemy against heavy shelling, and in case of a real attack, an almost impregnable defense.

"THE THIRTIETH IN BELGIUM"

This map shows the location of the four regiments with respect to Ypres and Kemmel Hill. They took over this sector from the British on August 17 and held it until September 5, 1918, when they were relieved to move south and take part in drive on Hindenburg Line.

"AT THE HINDENBURG LINE"

This map, made for Col. Cary F. Spence, of the 117th Infantry, shows operation of all Thirtieth Division regiments from September 29 to October 20, 1918.

The attack upon this part of the line was set for the morning of September 29, 1918. The 27th American Division was on the left, the 46th British on the right of the 30th American Division. The American sector passed across the tunnel, but the British on the right and left were prepared to swim the canal in case no bridges were found to afford them passage. The assault of the infantry upon these fortifications was to be preceded by a bombardment of 72 hours—with gas shells for 24 hours and with shell and shrapnel from light and heavy artillery for 48 hours.

In the Thirtieth Division sector, the 119th and 120th Infantry were assigned to make the opening attack, with the 117th Infantry following in close support, and prepared to exploit their advance after the canal had been crossed. The 118th Infantry was held in reserve. The 119th Infantry had the left half of the sector, while the 120th, strengthened by Company H, of the 117th, covered the right half. In addition to his regimental strength, Colonel Spence, of the 117th, had under his command for the attack 92 guns of Australian artillery, 24 British tanks, and two extra machine gun companies. The plan of battle was that the regiment, following the 120th, should cross the canal between Bellicourt on the left and the entrance to the canal on the right, then turn at right angles, and proceed southeasterly down the main Hindenburg Line trench, mopping up this territory of the enemy for about a mile. Connection was to be made with the British on the right, if they succeeded in crossing the canal.

The facts of the case are that this paper plan of battle worked out somewhat differently under battle conditions. Most of the assaulting companies became badly confused in the deep fog and smoke, strayed off somewhat from their objectives, and their attack swung to the left of the sector. The 117th, which followed, went off in the opposite direction fortunately and cleaned out a territory which otherwise would have been left undisturbed. While it caused endless confusion and the temporary intermingling of platoons, companies, and even regiments, this pall of mist and smoke on the morning of the attack undoubtedly contributed to the success of the battle. The Germans did not know how to shoot accurately, for no targets were visible. During the morning hours it was impossible for a man to see his hand more than a few inches in front of him. Men in the combat groups joined hands to avoid being lost from each other. Officers were compelled, in orienting their maps, to lay them on the ground, as it was impossible to read them while standing in the dense cloud of smoke and mist. The atmosphere did not clear up completely until after the canal had been crossed.

The barrage for the attack went down at 5:50 a. m. The First Battalion, under Major Dyer, jumped off promptly on time, with C and D Companies in the line, A and B Companies in support. The Second Battalion followed at about 500 yards, while the Third Battalion, with a company of engineers, was held in reserve on the crest of a hill. The tanks, for the most part, became separated from the infantry, but their work was invaluable in plowing through the barbed wire, which had been cut up very little by the barrage. Like nearly everyone else, the tanks lost sense of direction in the smoke and fog cloud, while the majority of them were disabled before noon of the 29th.

Most of the morning was consumed by the 117th in clearing out the area south and west of the tunnel entrance. Some units, mistaking one of the trench systems for the canal, turned southward before actually reaching the genuine canal. They cleaned out thoroughly the Germans, who were in this pocket, shown on the accompanying map, but toward 10 o'clock turned northward and began to pass over the tunnel, the left flank skimming Bellicourt and the right crossing near the tunnel entrance. It then turned southward and mopped up the area assigned it. The Third Battalion, in the meanwhile, had been called from reserve and joined with the 119th Infantry in the attack northeast of Bellicourt. The First and Second Battalions reached their objectives after vigorous fighting, consolidated the positions they had won, and reorganized their companies, which had been badly scattered and mixed by the morning fog. At 8 p. m. the regiment was ordered to lie in support of the Australians, who had passed over earlier in the evening and gone forward to pursue the attack.

The casualties of the 117th on September 29 were 26 officers and 366 men. Seven field pieces, 99 machine guns, 7 anti-tank rifles, many small arms and 592 German prisoners were the trophies of the day. Though the casualties were rather heavy, in view of the machine gun and artillery resistance which the Germans offered from powerfully held positions, they should be regarded as rather light. With a clear day, without fog or smoke, they would have been double or treble this number.

The 117th was relieved from the line about noon of October 1, and before night the regiment was on its way back to the Herbicourt area on the Somme River for rest and reorganization. This period, however, was very brief, for on October 5 orders were issued to relieve an Australian brigade. On returning the Third Battalion was assigned to the line, the Second was placed in support, while the First was made the brigade reserve. The Third Battalion had many losses in relieving the Australians, for the night was very dark, getting into position difficult, and the enemy very active with his artillery and machine guns.

The offensive of the division, with the 59th Brigade making the attack, was scheduled for the morning of October 8. In preparation for it, it was thought necessary to straighten a salient of about 500 yards in depth in front of the 117th sector. Consequently, the Third Battalion, which was in the line, attacked on the morning of October 7. The order of battle was Company I on the left, Company L in the center, Company M on the right, with Company K in support and Company F, of the Second Battalion, in reserve. The attack started before six o'clock in the morning, after a heavy barrage had been laid down by the accompanying artillery. In spite of heavy shelling by German machine guns and artillery on both flanks, especially from the towns of Ponchaux and Geneve, the companies made fairly good gains during the day, fighting almost every foot of the way. This operation was a very costly one, perhaps the most bloody of the whole division in proportion to the number of men engaged, for out of the battalion, 12 officers and about 400 men were either killed or wounded.

The 59th Brigade offensive was launched the following morning, October 8, the 117th on the left, the 118th on the right. The British were on the flanks. The jumping off line was northeast of Wiancourt, while the objective was slightly beyond Premont. The First Battalion of the 117th launched the attack for the regiment, the Second Battalion was in close support, while the Third Battalion, which had been cut up badly the day before, was in reserve. The attack got off on time in spite of the difficulties that were encountered the previous night in getting into position under fire and in the dark.

In the face of furious German resistance with all kinds of machine gun nests and an abundance of light artillery, the battalions advanced very rapidly, skillfully knocking out machine guns and maneuvering to the best advantage over the broken ground. The Second Battalion suffered heavy losses during the morning and two companies of the brigade reserve were ordered to its support. Before noon Major Hathaway, who commanded it, announced the capture of Premont and his arrival at the prescribed objective. Positions were consolidated during the afternoon and preparations made for a possible counter-attack. The casualties of the 117th on October 8 were the heaviest of any day of fighting in which it was engaged on the front. The toll of officers and non-commissioned officers was especially distressing, as it cut down the number of leaders in the coming battles.

During the night, when all were expecting word of relief after such a strenuous day in which everyone had spent himself to the utmost, orders were received that the brigade would continue the fight at daybreak the next morning. The sector was moved to the right, however, and the front of attack shortened. The drive started before six o'clock in the morning, after the usual barrage had been laid down by the artillery. In spite of the fact that this shift was made at night, that the two battalions had to reorganize and gather their men from the attack the day previous, and that the Germans kept up their bombardment by artillery and aeroplanes, all the companies were on the tape and the attack was launched on the minute.

The resistance slackened during the day, and with the exception of a short check at a railroad embankment, the advance was steady toward the objective. The First and Second Battalions fought side by side, the Third Battalion was held in reserve and to further recuperate. There was a big decrease in the intensity of the hostile artillery fire during the day and the losses were light as compared to the day before. Busigny was captured and all objectives reached early in the afternoon. The 119th Infantry, of the 60th Brigade, passed over the regiment during the late afternoon and continued the attack.

During these three days of fighting, October 7, 8, and 9, the regiment lost 34 officers and 1051 men as casualties. A count of the spoils taken included 113 machine guns, 28 field pieces, 907 small arms and about 800 prisoners. The great majority of the latter, 703, were captured on October 8, showing that on the final day the men, enraged by the losses of their comrades the day previous, killed most of the Germans they took. This became not an uncommon practice in the latter days of fighting, especially against the German machine gunners, who would kill or wound from their place of concealment a half platoon or more of men before their gun was located and put out of action. This custom of taking no prisoners was confined to no regiment, but became common practice throughout the division.

The next few days were given the 117th to rest and recuperate, a course it sorely needed after the exhaustion and losses of the last three days of its fighting. On the morning of October 16, however, it was called back into the line to relieve the 27th American Division. The First Battalion, less Company C, which was relieved just before the battle on account of ptomaine poisoning, jumped off in a new attack the following morning, October 17. The Second Battalion, which followed it, caught the brunt of the enemy fire. Major Hathaway was wounded early in the morning, and Captain Ware, the remaining captain of the battalion, was sent back a short time later with a serious wound. Lieut. Baker, as senior officer, took command and led it the rest of the day, while non-commissioned officers commanded two companies because there were no officers left. Molaine was captured by the regiment, an advance of more than a mile across the Selle River was made, but heavy machine gun fire held up the advance on Ribeaupville, which was protected by a railroad embankment. The British had been checked on the right and so it was thought inadvisable to push the capture of the town immediately by a frontal attack, when it might be taken later from the flank.

The regiment was relieved on the night of October 17, with the exception of the Third Battalion, which was assigned to the support of the 60th Brigade during the attack the following day. The 117th remained in this area until October 20, when the whole division started back to the rear for rest, reorganization and a new supply of officers and men to bring it up again to war strength. The area designated was near Amiens. Expectation was that the whole division would be ordered back into the line about November 15, but the signing of the armistice put an end to any return to the battle front.

"FIFTY-ONE MEN AND OFFICERS OF THE 117TH INFANTRY WHO RECEIVED MEDALS FOR BRAVERY IN BATTLE."

After receiving some fresh replacements, the 117th entrained for the Le Mans area on November 22, arriving there two days later and remaining until March 10, 1919. An intensive schedule of drill, maneuvers, and parades was carried out, even during the winter months. General Pershing visited the division and reviewed it during its stay here. In February, the regiment moved into the forwarding camp at Le Mans, went through the delousing plant and was furnished some personal equipment for the men. This month was one of severe trial, for fuel was very short, the weather was cold and rainy, and an epidemic of influenza ran through the camp. Some of the men, who had endured the hardships of battle, succumbed to the disease on the eve of returning home. On March 10 the trains arrived to transport the regiment to St. Nazaire, from which its boat sailed on March 16. The transport arrived in Charleston harbor the latter days of the month, and the men were entrained at once for Columbia, where they were given their final delousing and furnished some new clothing.

The triumphal return began the first week of April, 1919, Knoxville being the first stop. A reception, in which it seemed that all East Tennessee joined and to which the city turned out en masse, was tendered the officers and men in the one day of their stay. The crowd was historic in size and in enthusiasm. A parade through the principal business streets, which were jammed with cheering thousands, and a banquet to every man in uniform were the principal features of the day. The regiment then went to Nashville where it received a similar welcome. Chattanooga was the last city in which a parade was given. A splendid welcome was given the men and officers there. The regiment was mustered out of service at Fort Oglethorpe, nearby, during the middle of April.

A resume of the regiment's laurels, as well as its losses between July 4, when it came under shell fire, and November 11, the date of the armistice, shows the following interesting figures: Prisoners captured, 1758; machine guns 268; field pieces 44; small arms, about 3000; anti-tank rifles 12. Total casualties of officers and men were 1818, of which 81 were officers and 1737 were non-commissioned officers and enlisted men. Total deaths of officers and men were 366. The regiment's total advance into hostile territory was 11 2-3 miles and the towns captured by it were Premont, Busigny and Molaine.

No finer testimony to the bravery of both officers and men can be found than in the number of medals and decorations with which they were honored. Three men won the coveted Congressional Medal of Honor, while 126 other men and officers were awarded the American Distinguished Service Cross, the British Distinguished Service Order, the British Military Cross, the Distinguished Conduct Medal and the Military Medal. While statistics are not available now, it is doubtful whether any regiment in our army surpassed this record in the same period of time.

Major-General Lewis, commanding general of the Thirtieth Division, decorated the colors of the regiment for participation in the following engagements:

Canal Sector, July 16-August 30.
Ypres-Lys Offensive, August 31-September 2.
Somme Offensive, September 20-October 20.

He also cited the regiment in divisional orders for its distinguished conduct in battle. Colonel Cary F. Spence, its commanding officer, was cited by General Pershing for his distinguished leadership in action. The regiment also shared equally in the ten citations conferred upon the whole Thirtieth Division by the English and Australian High Command.

COLONEL JAMES A. GLEASON

All the way from a "buck" private to a full colonel is the gamut that Col. Gleason's military career has run in a period of twenty-five years of almost continuous service. He enlisted in the Tennessee national guard in 1891; saw service in the Spanish-American War with the Third Tennessee Volunteer Infantry; commissioned successively, second lieutenant, first lieutenant, captain and lieutenant-colonel of it between 1904-12; and served with it on the Mexican border until he resigned on January 29, 1917.

During all these years he was very active in state national guard circles and spent much time in keeping alive the military spirit, especially in East Tennessee. He was often a competitor at national rifle matches and was inspector of small arms for the state guard.

After the declaration of war on Germany, Col. Gleason was largely instrumental in raising the Second Tennessee Infantry and received a commission as its lieutenant-colonel. On its dismemberment at Camp Sevier, he was transferred to the 114th Field Artillery with the same rank. He served through all of its campaigns on the Western Front: the St. Mihiel, Argonne Forest and Woivre Plain offensives and the Toul and Woivre defenses. For his military leadership and his outstanding ability as a handler of military men he received his promotion to full colonel in 1919 at Le Mans, France, just before he sailed home to be mustered out. During his army career he commanded at different times four regiments—the Second and Third Tennessee Infantry and the 114th and 115th Field Artillery.

SECOND TENNESSEE INFANTRY

No Knoxville organization of men made a more commendable record or participated more actively in the operations in Belgium and against the Hindenburg Line in Flanders than those who went to Camp Sevier as members of the Second Tennessee Infantry. Yet because this regiment was merged with others in the organization of the Thirtieth Division and its officers and men scattered through several different units of the division, it has never received the credit and the glory it should have for its splendid record both in training camp and on the battlefield.

The Second Tennessee was raised largely through the efforts of Colonel James A. Gleason, of Knoxville, who was commissioned lieutenant-colonel, with Charles B. Rogan, adjutant general of Tennessee, as colonel and commander of the organization. The majority of General Rogan's time was needed in the administration of his state office, and so the burden of organizing most of the companies and the task of equipping and whipping them into military units fell largely to Colonel Gleason during the summer of 1917. The state was aflame with the war spirit and so little difficulty was experienced in raising the new regiment, the companies of which were liberally distributed over the three grand divisions of the state.

The formal organization of the regiment was: Charles B. Rogan, of Nashville, colonel and commander; James A. Gleason, of Knoxville, lieutenant-colonel; Roane Waring, of Memphis, Hal Holmes, of Trenton, and James W. Birks, of Livingston, majors; Headquarters Company, of Nashville and Memphis, Captain George Hedge; Supply Company, of Nashville, Captain Harry Manners; Regimental Infirmary, of Knoxville, Major Robert H. Newman; Company A, of Dover and Cumberland City, Captain Thomas Miller; Company B, of Nashville and Fayetteville, Captain John L. Craig; Company C, of Livingston, Captain Timothy E. Stephens; Company D, of Crossville, Captain David Southard; Company E, of Newport, Captain Joseph Gaffney; Company F, of Bristol and Hariman, Captain Thomas Fauntleroy; Company G, of Knoxville, Captain William H. Beckner; Company H, of Rockwood, Captain T. Asbury Wright, Jr.; Company I, of Trenton, Captain William W. Wade; Company K, of Dyersburg, Captain William G. Green; Company L, of Memphis, Captain Frazier Hinton; Company M, of Memphis, Captain William F. Murrah, Machine Gun Company, of Murfreesboro, Captain Thomas Y. English.

In addition to Company G and the Regimental Infirmary, of Knoxville, there were scores of Knoxville men who, after their enlistment at home, were transferred to other companies of the regiment to fill them up to the necessary strength. In all, a fair estimate of the number of Knox County men who enlisted in the Second Tennessee would be between 400 and 500. They were stout, vigorous men, most of whom had never been in a military organization before, and who came straight from civil life to serve during the period of the emergency.

The regiment entrained and departed with the other organizations of the state national guard to Camp Sevier in the early days of September, 1917. A short time after its arrival, the reorganization of the regiments of the national guard of Tennessee and North and South Carolina took place under the direction of Major-General John F. Morrison, commander of the Thirtieth Division. The First Tennessee Infantry was converted into the 115th Field Artillery; the Third Tennessee Infantry became the 117th Infantry; the First Tennessee Field Artillery was numbered the 114th Field Artillery; Troops A, B, and C, of Cavalry, were converted into the 114th Machine Gun Battalion, while Troop D, of Knoxville, became the Trench Mortar Battery of the division. The hardest luck fell to the lot of the Second Tennessee, the last Tennessee organization, which was made a part of the Fifty-ninth Depot Brigade, destined later to furnish many of the replacements for the new organizations of the division, all of which were below the new war strength.

The transfer of the men and officers of the depot brigade did not take place immediately, however. Drilling was continued daily, and the same vigorous schedule that was outlined for the rest of the division was kept by all the companies and battalions of the brigade. In spite of the certainty that the separation would come in a few days or weeks, the esprit de corps of the Second Tennessee was kept at the highest mark, and many of the men and officers refused voluntary transfers to other organizations. They held the faint hope that some change might be made by which they might be held together as a unit and go overseas together.

The order for the compulsory transfer of the officers and men of the regiment came on October 22, 1917. The large majority of the men were sent to the 119th and 120th Infantry regiments of the Sixtieth Brigade, some few to the three machine gun battalions of the division, while still others went to the artillery regiments and the other units of the division. The officers were more widely scattered than the men. Col. Rogan was placed on the unassigned list; Lieutenant-Colonel Gleason went to the 114th Field Artillery with the same rank, but later received his promotion to a full colonelcy; while the line officers mainly stayed with the infantry regiments, though some few transferred to the artillery. The majority of them went with their men into the Sixtieth Brigade, the 119th and 120th regiments.

The history of the Sixtieth Brigade is largely that of the Fifty-ninth Brigade, the story of which has been told in previous pages. They fought side by side in Belgium and Flanders, each relieving the other to take up the drive against the German forces. The Sixtieth, together with units of the Fifty-ninth, made the assault upon the Hindenburg Line. The Fifty-ninth had the honor of launching the attack on October 8, while the Sixtieth took up the attack two days later. The Fifty-ninth also started the drive on October 17, which was taken up a day later by the Sixtieth.

Of the honors and decorations they won, the deaths and wounds they sustained, the battles and engagements in which the individual men and officers of the Second Tennessee Infantry from Knox County took part, only their individual records, which are given elsewhere, will tell fully. They will show that these men won their share and did their part to the utmost. All commanders under whom they served paid tribute to their courage, fidelity, and soldierly qualities. Had they been allowed to remain together as the unit in which they were organized, there is no doubt they would have made the same illustrious record which other Tennessee regiments did during the great war.

55th ARTILLERY BRIGADE

While the infantry of the Thirtieth Division was operating with the British armies around Ypres in Belgium and near St. Quentin in France, the artillery, composed of the 113th, 114th, and 115th Field Artillery Regiments and the Trench Mortar Battery, making up the Fifty-fifth Artillery Brigade, was attached to the American divisions on the southern end of the battle line and took part in the St. Mihiel, Argonne Forest and Woevre Plain offensives.

The separation of the artillery and infantry took place at Camp Sevier, South Carolina, in May, 1918, when the Thirtieth Division was ordered overseas. They were never together again until early in 1919, when both moved into the Le Mans area, France, preparatory to coming home. The artillery received its training for battle at Camp Coetquidan, near Rennes, France, while the infantry went through its preparation for fighting in the extreme northern part of France. The British needed infantry badly, their artillery was more plentiful. On the other hand, General Pershing was in greater need of artillery than of infantry for the operation in the St. Mihiel salient. Therefore, the Fifty-fifth Brigade was ordered to Toul to take part in the first All-American offensive instead of going to Belgium to support the two infantry brigades of the Thirtieth Division. It was used from the latter part of August, 1918, up to the close of the fighting on November 11 as army, or "shock" artillery, being moved from sector to sector as the needs of the hour for artillery were greatest.

The majority of the men from Knox County in the artillery brigade were in Battery "C", of the 114th Field Artillery, and the Trench Mortar Battery. There were quite a few men, however, who were scattered through the other organizations of the 114th, while perhaps a dozen were members of the 115th Artillery Regiment. Battery "C" was recruited by Captain Roy V. Myers in the summer of 1917, while Captain Ambrose Gaines raised at the same time Troop D, of cavalry. Upon the organization of the Thirtieth Division in the fall of 1917, Troop D was converted into the Trench Mortar Battery of the artillery brigade. On the promotion of Captain Myers to be a major at Camp Sevier, the command of his battery was taken over by Captain Reese Amis, who remained at its head until it was mustered out of service in April, 1919. After his arrival in France, Captain Gaines was compelled by illness to relinquish command of the Trench Mortar Battery to Lieut. Flem Hazen, who was later promoted to the rank of captain, and who handled it in the engagements in which it took part upon the front.

For variety of experiences, observation of the many phases of fighting, and actual participation in the number of battles, these two Knoxville units saw service second to none. They were in the line fighting from the latter part of August, 1918, when they entered the Toul sector, until the hour of the armistice on the morning of November 11. They were in three major engagements—the St. Mihiel, Meuse-Argonne and Woevre Plain offensives—and two minor operations—the defense of the Toul and Woevre sectors. They were a part, at different times, of the First, Second, Third American armies and the Fourth French army. They were attached to six American and French corps and served with seven American divisions, supporting the 89th, 37th, 32nd, 79th, and 33rd in battle operations.

The first large engagement in which they took part was the attack on the St. Mihiel salient, September 12 to 14, 1918. They were in the very van of the fighting, their positions being just behind the infantry lines at Flirey in the center of the drive on the right side of the pocket. They lost no men in the initial attack, and followed the infantry forward to Bouillonville as soon as the engineers could build a road across the old German trenches. On the third day after the fighting began, when they had penetrated as far forward as Beney, the order came for the whole brigade to leave the sector and move to the Argonne Forest to take part in the offensive there.

This move of about 100 miles was the bitterest test to which the brigade was subjected. The horses for pulling the guns had been exhausted in the preparation for and participation in the previous fighting, the men were worn out, their nerves were frayed from lack of sleep and rest, and rations were pitifully short. All marching was done by night, beginning at sundown and continuing until daylight the next morning. The nights were cold and clammy, and many of the men became sick. The woods in which they often slept by day were little better than swamps.

They arrived, however, by forced marches and went into position on the night of September 24. By working most of the day and part of the following night in digging trail pits and bringing up ammunition, all batteries were ready and took part in the huge bombardment over a 20-mile front on the morning of September 26, signalling the opening of the greatest and longest battle in which American arms ever took part. That afternoon they followed the infantry forward through Avocourt toward Montfaucon, the German strong-point of the Argonne sector. They went forward again the following day, taking positions just back of and to the left of Montfaucon, remaining there for several days because the infantry had trouble in advancing the lines against the German resistance. This was overcome after two or three days and the artillery moved into the vicinity of Ivoiry and Epinonville. There it remained until withdrawn on October 6.

The Woevre sector was held then until November 8, when the preparations began for the great offensive of the Second American Army to outflank Metz with the aid of the First American Army. All units of the brigade moved forward into the Woevre Plain on the night of November 10 and were ready for the drive toward Conflans, when the announcement of the armistice put an end to the fighting the next morning after a few rounds had been fired. It was a very fortunate termination for the brigade, for most of its batteries were out upon an open plain, with little protection, and subject to direct fire by the enemy's artillery. Had the fighting continued during the day of November 11, the casualties undoubtedly would have been very heavy.

In December, 1918, about a month after the close of hostilities, the brigade moved forward with the 33rd Division as a part of the Army of Occupation. Their route lay through Conflans, Longwy, Luxemburg, and on to the German border. There they were halted, but before the orders to turn back into the center of Luxemburg arrived, Battery "C", which was at the head of the brigade, drove over the bridge into Germany. Thus it was the only unit of the 30th Division which actually got into Germany. Shortly after January 1, the brigade was ordered to rejoin the division at Le Mans. The march was made back through Luxemburg and France to Trondes, near Toul, where special trains carried the regiments to the Le Mans area. Enroute the worst accident of the months in France befell the brigade. A train wreck occurred in which twenty-three men were killed and many more injured near Chaumont. Two of the men killed were members of Battery "C".

The Trench Mortar Battery received orders to return home ahead of the rest of the division. It went to Brest for debarkation, reached Newport News on March 6, 1919, and was mustered out a week later. The remainder of the brigade, including Battery "C", left France early in March and reached America some two weeks later. The mustering out took place at Fort Oglethorpe, after parades through Knoxville, Nashville, and Chattanooga, where the regiments were greeted with tremendous crowds. The discharges were handed the men on April 7, 1919.

"READY FOR CAMP"

These groups are of the 280 men, inducted into service May 24, 1918, at Knoxville. It was the largest single group inducted into service from Knox County through the draft call and they were given a great send-off at the federal building and a parade to the railroad station. Most of them were assigned later to the Second Corps Artillery Park.

SECOND CORPS ARTILLERY PARK

Pursuant to a special call issued by the War Department for an additional 55,000 men, 280 young men of Knoxville and Knox County were formally mustered into the service of the United States on Tuesday, May 21, 1918. Exactly two months later a large proportion of these men steamed into the harbor of Brest, France, as members of the various units of Second Corps Artillery Park. Before the signing of the armistice, this Knox County contingent had actively participated in four of the greatest battles of the war—a record achieved by few units of the American Expeditionary Forces and excelled by still fewer.

The Second Corps Artillery Park was known as an artillery auxiliary unit. At no time was it attached to any division, but was placed where its services were most needed. This meant its labor scarcely lapsed from the time the unit landed in France July 21, 1918, until its broken remnants set sail for home in July, 1919. From August 10-15, the Second Corps Artillery Park served with the American forces in the latter part of the Aisne-Marne offensive, which comprised all fighting in the famous Chateau-Thierry district and is commonly known as the Second Battle of the Marne. September 12-15 it was engaged with the American First Army in the St. Mihiel drive. For weeks previous to this battle, however, the organization worked tirelessly on the Toul front in preparation for the offensive. September 17 to October 17 it was attached to the Second French Army and actively engaged in the Oise-Aisne offensive. October 17 to November 11 it did valiant work with the Fifth Army Corps of the American First Army in the historical battle of the Argonne Forest. Three times the organization was cited by the ranking generals of the American and French armies for valuable results accomplished during these offensives.

Boarding a special train at Knoxville Friday, May 24, 1918, after one of the most patriotic and enthusiastic demonstrations ever accorded a departing unit, the men reached Fort Thomas, Kentucky, the following day, were quickly examined and outfitted, and at 10:30 o'clock Sunday morning started for Camp Jackson, South Carolina, as field artillery replacements. Reaching Camp Jackson early Monday evening, they were assigned to a field artillery replacement depot and during that week received their first training in the rudiments of soldiery. However, their experience as field artillery replacements was destined to be of short duration.

Saturday, June 1, the men were ordered to move to another part of the camp and there were assigned to the new organization known as the Second Corps Artillery Park. This unit, destined to be a motorized outfit, was composed of six truck companies of 140 men each and one company of 250 men known as the Park Battery, making a total of approximately 1,100 men, and comprising a majority of the 280 Knox County boys and about 100 from Louisville, Ky. Practically the entire remainder of the new unit hailed from Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Massachusetts and Maine.

The regiment was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel H. H. Rogers, of New York. Knoxville and Louisville men were assigned entirely to Companies A, B and the Park Battery. The original duties of the organization in the battle area was to repair and replace disabled artillery pieces, but, after reaching France, the work assigned to the six truck companies was almost wholly that of hauling ammunition. The Park Battery was placed in charge of various ammunition depots and of loading and unloading trucks, a gruelling labor continually beset by the danger of enemy artillery and aeroplane attacks.

After one month of intensive military training, the Second Corps Artillery Park entrained July 1 for Camp Stuart, Newport News, Virginia. The organization was reoutfitted, received its final overseas examination and early on the morning of July 10 boarded the former Pacific liner Matsonia, which was accompanied by four other transports and escorted by two torpedo boat chasers. On July 13, they were joined by six transports, a cruiser and two destroyers that had embarked from the port of New York. Reaching the war zone July 18, all men were required to assemble at their respective life rafts at 7:30 o'clock each evening and remain there until dark—about 10:30 o'clock in that latitude during the summer. They were assembled there again at 2:30 o'clock in the morning and remained until breakfast, such precautions being taken because of the likelihood of submarine attack during either twilight or dawn. However, the voyage was made wholly without incident and the dawn of July 21 brought the joyful sight of the dim outlines of Brest, France.

After enduring the rain, mud, and flies of the celebrated Pontanazen Barracks until Wednesday morning, July 24, the men boarded a train that was to carry them to their work on the battle front. After riding 22 hours, however, they awakened to find themselves once more in Brest, a change in orders having turned them about and brought them again to their starting point. For the next week the members of the regiment were used on the docks of Brest as stevedores. On August 1, part of the men were ordered to Havre and Bordeaux for trucks, while the remainder started overland in trucks that were to be part of the regiment's equipment and driven by its own men. Friday, August 9, the overland contingent, after traveling 425 miles, reached the destroyed village of Mont St. Pere, nine kilometers east of the famous city of Chateau-Thierry and situated on the north bank of the beautiful Marne River. Here the remainder of the regiment was awaited and to the east of Mont St. Pere the first work in the battle areas was done. The fighting in this vicinity was known as the Aisne-Marne offensive.

Wednesday, August 14, camp was broken and, with its 167 steel-bodied ammunition trucks, the regiment traveled to a point seventeen kilometers west of Chateau-Thierry. There it remained until the following Tuesday, when once more a long trip overland was started which ended near the city of Toul, August 24. After three days of work towing artillery and transporting French troops, the regiment moved its camp into a dense forest several miles north of Toul and only a short distance from the German front lines. During the stay here the men received their first real taste of actual warfare. Continually beset by the dangers of artillery and aeroplane fire, ammunition was hauled nightly for two weeks in pitch darkness over dangerously slippery roads, heavy with war traffic of all kinds. On the afternoon of August 29, two well-placed German artillery projectiles touched off an ammunition dump several acres in area, which was maintained by the organization, and to which its trucks had been hauling shells. Two terrific explosions rocked the earth and the sound of bursting shells continued all through the night. Fortunately, no one was hurt.

During the great St. Mihiel offensive which followed on September 12, many of the trucks continued to supply the big guns with ammunition all through the night of the opening attack. The following day a hundred Second Corps Artillery Park trucks loaded with shells started a slow trail in the wake of the swiftly advancing Yanks. Over roads blown to atoms by artillery fire and through a maze of traffic, travel was slow, indeed, and it was the evening of September 15 before they reached a point southwest of Metz, unloaded and returned to camp. This ended the work in the St. Mihiel offensive.

September 17 the regiment again broke camp and moved to the village of Lavoye, twenty kilometers southwest of the devastated city of Verdun. After a short stay there, headquarters were moved to Fleury-sur-Aire, where for the next thirty days the regiment hauled ammunition for the Second French Army, to which it had been attached for the Oise-Aisne offensive. The work of the companies was done principally in the vicinity of Verdun. This was a month of severe hardships, of work by day and by night.

The regiment was relieved from duty with the Second French Army on October 17 and immediately assigned to the Fifth Army Corps of the American First Army. The battle of the Argonne Forest was then in full swing and, day after day, night after night, the companies of the regiment were constantly on the road hauling ammunition to our batteries of artillery which were slowly blasting a way forward for the infantry. Often times these trips were of sixty to seventy-two hours duration and were always made under continuous shell fire and unspeakable hardships. Rain fell almost constantly and the trucks, being coverless, gave no protection from the constant downpour.

By November 4 the American army had advanced so far north that it became necessary to move camp near the one-time village of Very, and finally to the village of Gesnes, about 35 kilometers northwest of the city of Verdun and in the very heart of the upper Argonne. During the last stages of the Meuse-Argonne drive many Second Corps boys dauntlessly ran their trucks through shell fire in plain view of the enemy gunners, and on one occasion a few trucks out-distanced the infantry and unloaded cases of shells at the edge of the village of Beauclaire while the Germans yet occupied the town. One detachment of Second Corps trucks advanced with the artillery to the edge of the city of Sedan. Their forward movement was only stopped by the signing of the armistice.

All kinds of rumors were circulated after November 11 as to what would be done with the Second Corps Park. They ranged from the statement that the regiment would go into Germany as a part of the Army of Occupation, to the report that it would return immediately to parade in Washington on Christmas day. What it did do for the next two months was to haul salvage of every sort and description from off the battlefields to the numerous points of concentration. The greater part of this work lay on the old Verdun battlefield, a devastated area so wasted, so dead, so barren after a four-year scourge of hell-fire that it had become a combined desert and charnel house. For awhile the hauling of hand grenades was the chief occupation, but after one truck load blew up, the regiment was relieved from further hauling of these dangerous little missiles.

Finally, orders came to depart and on January 20 the Second Corps Park entrained at Dun-sur-Meuse for Brest, which was reached January 23 after sixty-eight hours of travel in box cars too crowded to lie down and with the weather very wintry. After two weeks of suspense, the regiment became a skeleton organization of 76 men and the remainder transferred to Brest Casual Companies 239, 240, 241, 242, and 243. As casual companies, some men were used as truck drivers, some as military police, others as stevedores and mechanics, while others drew special duty with the Motor Transport Corps. This lasted until May, 1919, when all were relieved, supposedly to depart for home. However, after three weeks' labor with pick and shovel, building a railroad, all were restored to their original status and once more took up the old duties. Early in July, though, the glad day finally arrived when the last member of the organization bade a final farewell to the shores of France and soon arrived home after one year's foreign service well done.

"RETURN OF OUR VICTORY FLEET"

American dreadnaughts, returning from European waters, sailed up the New York harbor in battle formation in April, 1919.

OUR NAVY IN THE WAR

The hundreds of Knox Countians, who cast their lot with the navy and went to sea during the world war, made the same splendid record and wrote as glorious a page in local history as their brothers who chose the army and fought the Huns on land. They ably upheld the traditions established a half century ago by Farragut and Maynard as the guardians of our flag upon the trackless paths of the ocean. Theirs was not so spectacular a task, nor did they receive the publicity and prominence which other branches of the service did. Yet the two million soldiers, who sailed to France under the convoy of our fleet, know the relentless vigil and the hourly peril that the men of the navy underwent that our armies, with the food and equipment for them, might reach the battle line in safety.

For nineteen months they braved the dangers of the sea upon battleships and cruisers, submarines and merchantmen. They stood guard with the English at the mouth of the Kiel Canal to await the appearance of the German fleet for battle, they hunted the seas upon destroyers and chasers to ferret out the hostile submarines, they manned the transport vessels that plied the Atlantic in transporting our troops to France. There was little relief or rest for them, for their vessels were at sea the great majority of the time. They were ever under the shadow of death from the monsters that lurked beneath the waters.

The navy was the one department of our government which was ready for action when war was declared. Within a few hours after the passage of the war resolution, Admiral Sims was gathering a fleet of destroyers and preparing to sail for Queenstown, England. In less than a month they were on guard duty in European waters. It is worthy of more than passing comment that in all the criticism and vituperation, which flooded the nation in its mad frenzy to get ready adequately for the war, and in the series of investigations which followed its close, there was never any abuse or evil said of the navy. It went through the trying period without scandal or investigation. Its efficiency was so thorough that no partisan or political attack was made upon it.

Of the varied work which our navy did during the war, perhaps the greatest and most effectual was in the convoy and transportation of troops and supplies to Europe. While the English merchant marine gave great assistance by furnishing the vessels for a great deal of this work, the larger part of it was done by our own navy. This was work of the most vital nature, for the cries and pleas of our allies for more, more men in the spring and summer of 1918 were insistent. Defeat stared them in the face unless they had more divisions to check the German onslaughts. Every sea-going vessel that our government owned, which was not absolutely needed in some other phase of work, was manned by the men of the navy and put into the transportation service.

The convoy system, which was worked out as a means of avoiding the heavy losses of the British, who sent out ships alone upon the sea to become the prey of the submarines, consisted of collecting several troop or cargo vessels into a group, sailing from the same port at the same time. There were usually a dozen or more of these craft which put to sea as a unit, and which followed a well known lane across the ocean. Cruisers and the older battleships protected them from German raiders, while a flotilla of destroyers met them when they entered the danger zone and guarded them against submarine attack. If the submarines dared to appear in their midst, the transports scattered to avoid making themselves targets, but the fighting craft attacked with guns and depth bombs. After several encounters, in which they learned the system of defense that had been adopted, the submarines became more wary of attack upon these groups and con-finer their attention more and more to unprotected vessels on the high seas. The fear, which swept over the American people at the beginning of the war because of the submarine terror, gradually subsided as every transport vessel bound for France with troops arrived there in safety.

That not a single ship of the hundreds, which transported two million men to France, was torpedoed while eastward bound, and that only three—the President Lincoln, the Antilles, and the Covington—were sunk on return trips to America, is eloquent proof of the success of the convoy system and of the vigilance exerted by our cruisers and destroyers against would-be attackers. The submarine peril, which reached its apex about the time this nation entered the war, steadily declined thereafter. Our own losses at sea were insignificant in proportion to the amount of tonnage that was exposed in the nineteen months of our participation in the war to the attacks of the submarines. While complete figures are not available, statistics for several months indicate that the sinkings of all American vessels by mines and torpedoes were somewhat less than one per cent of our tonnage.

While a part of our fleet was guarding transport and cargo vessels, the rest of it was waging an active, offensive warfare on the submarines upon the high seas and around the channel ports, standing guard with the British fleet at the mouth of the Kiel Canal, planting mines in the strategic areas in the North or Mediterranean Seas, or patrolling our long coast line against hostile attacks. Only three fighting ships were lost as a result of enemy action. They were the Alcedo, a converted yacht; the Jacob Jones, a converted torpedo boat destroyer; and the San Diego, a cruiser. None of the larger and heavier battle ships were injured.

Some of the most effective, as well as the most dangerous work done by our navy was in the laying of mines. These made a great barrier against the escape of the German fleet and the slipping out of an occasional raider to prey upon commerce. The seas between Norway and Scotland, which were the main outlet, were planted with thousands of mines by special mine layers. To the south, the American navy had another force of vessels which cooperated with the British in sweeping the English Channel of these menaces to the safety of transport ships.

On land the navy's activities were not inconsiderable. No unit or branch of the service showed greater bravery or won more laurels during the war than the men of the marine corps. Their deeds at Belleau Woods, Bouresches, Soissons, St. Mihiel and in the Argonne Forest have been told in song and story. The personnel of this peculiar branch of the navy, which is trained for both land and sea duty, was of the very highest. They proved their valor on field after field of battle. Their defense of Belleau Woods is one of the epics of the war. Of the eight thousand who were picked for service in France, more than a half were killed or wounded.

The most notable need of our army in France was artillery. The French furnished General Pershing with the lighter calibers, but there was a deficiency of heavy, long range guns. The ordnance department of the navy came to the rescue by designing and constructing a battery of 14-inch rifles, shipping them across the seas on special mounts, and transporting them across France to the American front on special cars. They threw a projectile weighing 1400 pounds and had a range of about 20 miles. They were used with great effect in bombarding towns and strong points far in the rear of the German lines. Their military effect was far superior to that of the German "Big Berthas," which terrified Paris. In spite of their tremendous size and weight, they were thoroughly mobile and capable of being moved on short notice to other parts of the front.

In the execution of the innumerable demands made upon it by the requirements of the war, the navy underwent an expansion and growth almost in proportion to that of the army. The number of officers was increased from 4,376 to 10,409, the enlisted personnel from 62,667 to 216,968. The men and officers, who were members of the naval reserve in time of peace, also were called to active duty during the war. The number of officers was enlarged from 877 to 21,622, while the personnel of the enlisted men was raised to 289,639, of whom about 8,000 were women.

At the close of the war, our navy had 40 battleships of the first-class, 32 cruisers, 125 destroyers, 17 torpedo boats, 68 submarines, 303 submarine chasers, 79 mine planters and sweepers, 56 yachts on patrol duty, 33 gunboats, 8 monitors, and a few other ships used for special duties. Furthermore, our navy was manning 50 troop transports, 230 cargo transports, 50 patrol vessels, and 175 barges. The total number of ships operated at the end of the war was about 2,000, as compared with 250 when the war begun.

Our navy had moved from third into second place among the naval powers of the world, displacing Germany and ranking next to England. With the additions made in the few months following the war as the result of construction begun before that time, the gap that separated us in naval strength from first place upon the seas was cut down materially.

OUR AIR SERVICE

The glamor of the aeroplane drew scores of the young men of Knox County into its service during the world war. The fascination of the air, the thrill of spectacular combat high above the battle lines, the prospect of long flights far into enemy territory, the glory and fame with which the successful aviator was crowned, made a strong appeal to the young American with strong nerve and hardy constitution.

That only two—Lieut. McGhee Tyson and Lieut. Claude O. Lowe—lost their lives of the scores of Knox Countians who risked them, either as pilots or as observers, speaks for the safety of this apparently very hazardous branch of the service. Lieut. Tyson, who was in the naval aviation branch, made his sacrifice in a flight off the French coast, while Lieut. Lowe was killed in the smash of his plane at Arcadia, Florida.

While some got across and into action, the majority of the Knox County men in the air service suffered the same misfortune as the larger number of those who enlisted in the air department—they were still in the United States when the armistice came on November 11, 1918. Some of them were at the port, ready to sail. This failure to reach Europe was no fault of theirs, for statistics show that of the qualified flying officers, less than one in three left the United States. Sufficient service planes had not been produced to equip the flyers who were already in France, not to speak of the thousands on this side who were aching to meet the Huns.

The air program of the United States went through a multitude of vicissitudes, of bright promises and bitter disappointments before it became stabilized and was finally put upon an efficient war basis. Because of the lack of planes, our airmen did not become an active, decisive force in the air until the last two months of the war. When war was declared in April, 1917, the United States government had 55 serviceable planes, all of which were obsolete as compared with foreign models, and entirely unsuited to war conditions. Congress at once appropriated $600,000,000 for our air program. The confident prediction was made through newspapers and magazines that the United States would have 10,000 planes on the battle front in a year, a force sufficient to drive the Germans down and give the allies an overwhelming superiority.

The program, however, received jolt after jolt. German spies in factories held up quantity production of training planes and ruined all of a certain model, making its abandonment necessary. Divided management and a change in directors of the whole air program further complicated the situation. A great deal of time was necessary in making tests and fitting the foreign designs to our 12-cylinder Liberty Motor, which proved our chief contribution to aviation. Difficulty was encountered in getting out the great quantity of spruce, fir, linen and other materials that are necessary in the construction of planes. Due to these and a great number of other difficulties, spring of 1918 came before the kinks in the air program were smoothed out and factories settled down to turn out planes and engines on a quantity basis.

After much experimenting and consultation with English and French aviation officials, it was decided to concentrate American production of a quantity scale on four types of machines: (1) the De Havilland observation and bombing plane; (2) the Handley-Page night bomber; (3) the Caproni bomber; (4) the Bristol fighting plane. Only the first was produced in quantity before the end of the war. Equipped with the Liberty Motor, it proved the fastest observation plane on the western front. About 700 were used in actual warfare, nearly 2000 more were in France, and 1100 were being turned out monthly at home when the armistice came. Two new models of planes, the Le Pere two-seater fighter and the Martin bomber, were developed and under tests made better performances than any known machines of their class. Neither was completed nor produced in quantity for use on the front. Liberty motors were manufactured much faster than planes. About 13,500 were accepted from the factories up to the time of the armistice, 4435 of these being shipped overseas for use. The British and French recognized the superiority of this engine and made contracts for large numbers of them.

American flyers, organized into strictly American squadrons, got their first real chance on the front in April, 1918, when two observation and one pursuit group, comprising about 35 planes, were assigned a definite sector. Their success was so immediate and thorough that the French readily turned over more planes to the Americans and the sector was widened considerably. In May, the number of American squadrons was increased to 9; in June to 14, in July to 15, in August, when the De Havillands began to arrive from America, to 25; in September to 30; in October to 42, and in November to 45 complete squadrons. In the early months, all of our squadrons were equipped with foreign planes, principally French. This continued until August 10, 1918, when the first American manufactured planes were put on the front. The supply grew rapidly in the next three months, and on the day of the armistice 667 of the 2698 planes our aviators were using were of American construction.

The first large air operation in which our squadrons took part was the St. Mihiel attack, for which General Pershing assembled the most formidable air force that was gathered during the war for a battle. French, British and English contributed some of their very best fighting squadrons. Our aviators, who were about one-third of the whole force employed, were organized into 12 pursuit, 12 observation and 3 bombing squadrons. We also had 15 balloon companies in operation. The American supremacy in the air during the two days of the attack was very decided. The enemy planes were kept on the ground largely, while ours went far behind the lines, located the German reserves, spotted ammunition dumps and enemy concentrations, and directed the long range artillery fire.

In the long struggle of six weeks in the battle of the Argonne Forest, which followed, American aviation was put to its most severe test. A great deal of the French and English aviation, which was loaned for the St. Mihiel operation, was withdrawn for use with their armies, but our increased production of planes somewhat made up for this loss. There was bitter fighting for the control of the air. The Germans drew to this front more than a proportionate amount of their very best planes and pilots. So vital an attack called forth their very best. Losses were heavy on both sides, but the enemy got the worst of it by a large edge. The American bombing, pursuit and observation squadrons did excellent work, getting far behind the German lines, bombarding day and night their lines of communication and ammunition dumps, and swooping down to the attack of any concentration of troops in the rear.

The test of battle showed the individual superiority of the Americans in the air. The Germans, during the few months which American aviators participated in the war, brought down 357 of our planes, while our aviators put 755 of the Hun machines out of commission. On the day of the armistice, there were 45 American squadrons, 1238 American flying officers and 740 service planes operated by them on the front. About 2500 flying officers were in reserve, while 7000 others in the United States lacked but a short specialized course of being equipped for battle duty. Had the war continued until the spring of 1919, the American air force in numbers and in equipment would have been far superior to that of any nation on either side. It would have been independent of all aid and ready to repay our allies for the generous assistance they rendered us while our air program was getting under way.

GENERAL ROBERT EMMET CALLAN

Graduating from West Point in 1896, General Callan saw service in the Spanish-American War as a lieutenant. He rose step by step until he had reached the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1917, being stationed in the Philippine Islands as chief of staff. On the outbreak of war, he asked to be sent to France on active duty.

He sailed in command of the 63rd Regiment, Coast Artillery Corps, on March 24, 1918. After participation in the Second Battle of the Marne, he was made brigadier-general and put in command of the 33rd Brigade, C. A. C. He was relieved of this to become head of the great artillery training school at La Borne, France, where eight regiments were trained at a time.

General Callan was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal by General Pershing on June 12, 1919, and later the Cross of the Crown of Italy from the Italian Government.

THE BATTLE OF ST. MIHIEL

Salient is the military term for the very common words "pocket" and "wedge." The St. Mihiel salient, the elimination of which was the first big, concerted, offensive operation of our forces in large number in France, was a deep pocket driven into the French lines in the fall of 1914 by the German armies in their attempt to outflank Verdun, whose forts held the key to the defense of Eastern France. The right edge of this wedge, as a glance at the map will show, was just above Pont-a-Mousson, while the left edge was at Les Eparges, a few miles southeast of Verdun.

This pocket, always the deepest and sharpest on the western front, was some 18 miles across from base to base, and slightly over 13 miles in depth. Yet measuring around its perimeter, it was no less than 40 miles in extent. To pinch off or close the salient meant shortening the line about 22 miles.

There were other considerations than the decrease in battle front which caused General Pershing to select this as the sector of attack of the First American Army. For four years this pocket had been a threat to Verdun, about which the Germans had closed on the northern and eastern side. If the left side of the wedge above St. Mihiel was driven still farther westward, Verdun would be virtually cut off and the French forces therein surrounded and captured. Furthermore, the German advance at the deepest point of the pocket barely cut the main railroad from Paris to Verdun, Toul, Epinal and Belfort, a double-track line that linked up the great fortresses of Eastern France. This had been a great loss, for it interfered with the speedy movements of troops from one sector to another of the southern battle front. It had been necessary for four years to transport troops by a single track line farther south, much longer and burdened with all traffic to Toul and Nancy.

As an offensive stroke, the closing of the St. Mihiel salient was fraught with equally great possibilities. It meant the restoration of about 150 miles of French territory, which was under the yoke of its German oppressors; the reversal from a threat to surround Verdun to a very decided menace of an allied attack upon Metz, the left hinge and base of the German battle line; the establishment of a straight base line from which attacks could be launched toward Conflans at the coal and iron fields of Briey and Longwy, the German mineral basins, and at the great railroad arteries through Sedan, Montmedy and Metz.

Several desperate attempts had been made by the French earlier in the war to straighten out their lines and relieve the pressure on Verdun. In the spring of 1915, they struck a hard blow with large numbers at Les Eparges on the western flank. The attack was continued several weeks and both sides left thousands of dead on the field of battle. The Germans were estimated to have lost 30,000 killed in this series of operations, while the French casualties were even heavier. Outside of local gains, the attack was unsuccessful. The French resumed their drive in the summer on the other side of the pocket at Apremont, attempting to crush in that flank. The fighting was bitter and the French made some headway, but all was lost in a counter-offensive of the Germans in the fall of 1915. After that nothing was done on either side for three years, as the tide of active operations shifted to other sectors. Both sides improved their defensive fortifications, but neither assumed the offensive. The lines were held by divisions that needed rest and recuperation from operations elsewhere.

The military strategy employed by General Pershing in the reduction of this salient is explained very well by a homely illustration. Pont-a-Mousson and Les Eparges, the bases of the pocket, were the hinges of two great doors which opened outward in the direction of St. Mihiel. If the doors were swung together on these hinges, they would meet just north of Vigneulles and form a straight line. To accomplish this, it was necessary for the divisions on the left flank to work eastward, while those on the right side made their way northwesterly to join them. The attacks had to be so timed that the flanks would arrive at the junction point at the same time. It was necessary also that the maneuver be accomplished quickly to cut off the German forces at the bottom of the pocket and prevent their escape.

For the successful execution of this operation, General Pershing withdrew from the Marne salient the eight divisions, which were engaged there in the hot fighting of June and July, 1918; brought from other quiet sectors several divisions which were receiving their training in trench warfare; and transported clear across France from their training camps still other divisions which had had no actual battle experience. The organization of the First American Army and the commencement of assembly of all the units that were to take part in the attack began August 10. The plans of the general staff provided for the concentration of about 600,000 troops of all arms and branches, together with their weapons and material, for the operation. As it was planned as a surprise, all movements were conducted by night. No troops or signs of unusual activity were visible on the roads by day. But with the fall of night, all highways were jammed with trucks, guns, ammunition, tanks, and wagons, going forward in position for the drive. The front line trenches were held lightly so that the enemy might not suspect the blow that was being aimed at him. Complete success depended upon overwhelming him before he could adequately man with his reserves the powerful defensive fortifications he had built.

The moral and psychological value of the operation's success was almost as great as the military advantages to be obtained. While the American divisions had fought splendidly when brigaded with the British and French, they had conducted no offensive on their own initiative and under their own leadership. The elimination of the salient would be the acid test of their offensive ability, while the successful execution of a task at which the French had failed for four years would not only inspire respect and courage in our allies as well as strike terror in the hearts of the Germans, but the American people would be aroused to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by an action in which our fresh, vigorous troops were pitted successfully against their much vaunted German foes.

The plans of the attack were worked out to the minutest detail by the army staff. The hour and minute at which the barrages were to be laid down, the rate of advance of the infantry behind them, the sector of attack of each division, the objectives of each day's fighting were mapped out carefully in advance, and all commanders, from division down to platoon leaders, were rehearsed on the parts assigned to each. Special stress was laid upon the effective cooperation of all arms, infantry, artillery, aviation, tanks, machine guns, engineers and supply trains. The French were of very great assistance, for in addition to loaning us much artillery, many of their best bombing and scout planes, and all of the tanks that were used in the attack, they contributed three divisions for the very delicate operations against the German troops at the nose of the salient.

The infantry of nine American divisions was assigned to make the attack on the two flanks of the pocket, crush them in by frontal assaults, close to the center, and capture the garrison of several thousand men at its bottom. On the right flank, strung from Pont-a-Mousson as a pivot, was the First Corps, commanded by General Liggett, and composed of the 82nd, 90th, 5th and 2nd divisions. General Dickman commanded the Fourth Corps, made up of the 89th, 42nd and 1st divisions, which were stationed in the center of attack and upon the left of the First Corps. Upon the left of the Fourth Corps, and strung lightly around the tip of the salient from Nivray to Mouilly, was the Second French Corps, while the western base of the wedge was held by the Fifth American Corps, under General Cameron, made up of the 26th and 4th American divisions and a French division. In reserve for the three American Corps were the 3rd, 35th, 78th and 91st divisions, while the 33rd and 80th were available in case of need.

The artillery concentration for the attack was one of the greatest of the entire war. Guns were so numerous that they seemed placed behind every particle of cover available. They were greatly out of proportion to the amount of infantry used. Their number was about 2,000, while their calibers ranged from the famous French 75's up to three huge American naval guns, which had a range of about 20 miles and which bombarded the German lines of communication far in the rear of the battle lines. All calibers were supplied lavishly with ammunition to batter down the strong natural and artificial defenses, which the enemy had erected in front of him in the four years of his occupation of this sector.

Of the 600,000 men assembled for the drive, about 250,000, twice the size of any American army ever engaged in one battle, were employed actively in the operations. The rest were kept in reserve or used in the service of supply to the combat troops. Against them were opposed seven German divisions in the line and four in reserve. However, though they were considerably inferior in numbers as compared with the attacking forces, a much smaller force was necessary to defend the salient than to attack it. They were powerfully supplied with the most potent weapons of defense, an abundance of all calibers of artillery and of light and heavy machine guns.

The Germans, in spite of the secrecy that was maintained in the preparations for the attack, seem to have had some inkling of its coming. Their plans, according to documents captured from prisoners, appear to have vacillated. Some of the heavy artillery was withdrawn to the second line of defense, known as the Michel position, and all work on fortifications was stopped a few days before the blow fell. No extra reserve divisions were brought into the sector for a more powerful defense. This was due probably to the fact that they were needed worse at other parts of the front to stem the French and English drives which were in progress. However, it has been established very clearly that the Germans did not evacuate the salient "according to previous plans", as the German war office announced after the battle to soften the bitterness of the losses in men, guns, and ground.

The attack started with a tremendous artillery preparation at 1 o'clock on the morning of September 12. The chorus of two thousand guns, majestic in their roar, lighting up the pitch black darkness of a rainy night with splashes like rays of lightning, and fairly shaking heaven and earth with their tremendous power, played for four hours upon the towns, shelters, and strong points of the enemy in the rear of their front lines and made the night for them a veritable inferno. At five o'clock sharp, all firing ceased and an unearthly calm pervaded everything for a half hour. Then all burst forth again in a mighty roar as a barrage of high explosive shell was laid down upon the front lines of the Germans. Our infantry, jumping out of their trenches in the fog and mist of the early morning, leaped forward through the tangle of barbed wire to the attack. They found the Germans huddled in groups in their dugouts or torn and mangled by the hurricane of shell and shrapnel. Some put up a sturdy resistance, others, bewildered and nerveless, gave themselves up with little fighting. The American troops, inspired by the success they attained in the first few hours of the fighting, pressed forward vigorously on the flanks of the pocket, while the French, with great skill, engaged the enemy at the bottom of the salient and prevented his retreat. The advance continued throughout the day and night of September 12, and early on the morning of September 13, the advance guards of the 1st and 26th Divisions met, as had been planned, just north of Vigneulles, where the doors of the wedge were to be closed.

Every objective of the commander-in-chief was attained and, during the course of the next two days, the line was straightened from Les Eparges to Pont-a-Mousson. The prisoners taken in the engagement numbered about 16,000, while the guns counted 443. These figures do not include a large number of machine guns and a great mass of materials and stores, which the Germans were forced to abandon in their haste to escape.

THE MEUSE-ARGONNE BATTLE

Of all the battles and engagements in which Knox Countians took part during the world war, more men and officers of them were engaged perhaps, first and last, in the 47-day struggle of the American army against the vital German positions in the Argonne Forest northward as far as Sedan than in any other large conflict or large operation in France. As has been pointed out in a previous chapter, these Knox Countians were not grouped into one combat unit, but were scattered through many organizations. They were to be found in the Fifty-fifth Field Artillery Brigade, the Second Corps Artillery Park, the Forty-second Division, the Eighty-first and Eighty-second Divisions, the marines, the five regular divisions and many of the other army, corps, and divisional units that participated in this long campaign.

The Meuse-Argonne offensive should be regarded as a campaign, a series of battles, rather than a single engagement. It was a prolonged struggle of almost seven weeks between two great armies, engaged in a death grapple at the most vital part of a battle line more than 400 miles long. No better illustration of the extreme importance, with which the German high command regarded the Argonne sector, can be found than in the manner in which its armies were disposed in the crucial months of October and November, 1918. Before the British and French troops the German armies were withdrawn as swiftly as possible and only rear-guard actions took place. Against the American forces, however, they resisted to the last inch with the best troops they had, knowing that if General Pershing reached his objective at Sedan, their whole line of communication on the Western Front would be pierced and the divisions against the French and English would be in danger of being flanked and cut off.

The plans for the attack were laid some weeks before it actually began. Toward the latter part of July or the first of August, 1918, when the success of the allied counter-offensive was assured and the offensive was definitely wrested from the German high command, Marshal Foch and General Pershing agreed upon the plan of action that the American armies should pursue on the eastern end of the battle front. First, the St. Mihiel salient was to be reduced; second, the German positions in the Argonne Forest and along the Meuse River were to be taken by frontal assault; third, the American and French armies were then to outflank and capture Metz, seizing the coal and iron fields of Longwy and Briey. If these operations were successful, the only tenable position for the enemy would be the east bank of the Rhine on German soil.

The first step was a complete success, although, if certain well authenticated rumors are correct, it was made against the wishes of Marshal Foch, who toward the latter part of August came to the opinion that this pocket could not be wiped out in time for the American divisions to reach the Argonne Forest and make adequate preparation within two weeks for such a great attack. The will of General Pershing prevailed, however, and his knowledge of the capabilities of his divisions was more than justified by events.

The German defenses from the Meuse to the Argonne were the most formidable on the western front. They were both natural and artificial. The natural defenses were a long series of heights and ridges, wooded and covered with brush, bushes, and strong points. Upon these the Germans had built successive lines of artificial defenses, the Hindenburg Line, the Hagen Stellung, the Volker Stellung, the Kriemhilde Stellung, and the Freya Stellung. Concrete machine gun and artillery emplacements, several closely woven barbed wire systems, mines and booby traps, and an intricate system of interlocking trenches added further strength to these natural fortifications, which guarded the great railroad system in their rear, the coal mines of Northern France and Belgium, and the iron mines of Lorraine.

The plan of battle called for the American army to attack from Vienne-le-Chateau, on the eastern border of the Argonne Forest, to the west bank of the Meuse River. A French army was to drive forward at the same time on the west side of the Argonne, thus creating two deep salients on both sides of the forest, which would cause the evacuation of its matted, tangled woods by the Germans therein. Nine infantry divisions—the 77th, 28th, 35th, 91st, 37th, 79th, 4th, 80th, and 33rd, arranged in order from left to right—were used by General Pershing to make the assault. They were supported by a tremendous concentration of American and French artillery of all calibers. The total number of guns employed in the preliminary bombardment, which began at 2:30 o'clock on the morning of September 26, was about 4,000. They fired more than 300,000 shells that day, a volume of shell and shrapnel and fire that no human force could resist on such a front. They withered and blasted all first line defenses in front of them, and made the early morning hours a living hell for the Germans, protected though they were by almost impregnable defenses.

In spite of this bombardment, the infantry, who leaped out of their trenches and went over the top at 5:30 a. m. behind a smoke and shell barrage, had great difficulties from the German machine gun fire. They were cut and slashed by the hostile gunners, hidden behind trenches, logs, up in trees, or behind any kind of protective cover. The advance was almost wholly through woods. Yet the progress on the first day was very satisfactory, for the German line was penetrated at some places to a depth of six or seven miles. Montfaucon, the highest point in the sector, was entered and definitely captured the following day. Most of the divisions reached their objectives. The attack was followed up the next day, still further progress being made, but not so much as the day before. The Germans, who had withdrawn much of their artillery during the bombardment, had pulled it back into prepared positions and within twenty-four hours they began to mow down the advancing waves of our infantry.

During the next four or five days the American infantry suffered bitterly, as the enemy knew their location and used both machine guns and artillery to destroy them. The gains were piece by piece, a few hundred yards each day. Furthermore, they did not have the full support of our artillery behind them, as a heavy rain and the lack of roads delayed the bringing forward of both guns and ammunition. The losses were very heavy, and it was necessary to relieve several of the divisions for rest and replacements. The net result of this first phase of the campaign was that the first two lines of the enemy's fortifications were broken down, he had been forced to draw heavily upon his best divisions in reserve, a considerable wedge had been driven into his lines, and he had lost a good deal of his artillery.

The second phase of the attack began with a heavy bombardment along all parts of the line. In spite of the fact that both light and heavy artillery had been brought forward into position, the assault met with strong resistance, as the enemy also had fortified his line with more troops and more machine guns and artillery. He saw the scope and aim of the drive, and therefore determined to stop it if possible. He was dug in behind the Kriemhilde Stellung, a strong line of defense along the heights north of Bantheville, Landres and St. Juvin. The fighting, under these circumstances, was tooth-and-toenail for the next three weeks. The American divisions made their progress almost by yards. Towns and villages were captured, then lost, and finally recaptured. Every hill or ridge was the scene of bloody fighting. Abundant aviation was brought into play to photograph every vital point and to bomb every concentration of troops. Many of the planes swooped down to the ground and sprayed the trenches with enfilading machine gun fire. But by the close of October the American advance had proceeded north of a straight line from Grand Pre to Briulles.

The third and final big drive of the campaign was launched on the morning of November 1. Sweeping gains were made that day and they were even more pronounced the day following. The divisions in the center drove a big salient into the heart of the enemy, capturing Buzancy, the German railhead in this region. The flanks also brought up their share of the advance. The enemy, it was apparent, had given up all hope of resistance and relied upon strong rear-guards to save his main body from capture by getting across the Meuse first. Learning that his resistance had been broken down, the American forces were driven full speed ahead night and day to intercept the enemy. Trucks were brought up to hasten the advance and wide gains were made daily. The left flank continued the chase northward, while the center and right were swung northeast and east to the Meuse. The first crossing was effected at Briulles on November 3-4, while other divisions followed and pressed the retreat toward Montmedy to cut the railroad lines there. Meanwhile, the Forty-second Division, which was on the left flank, went forward toward Sedan by leaps and bounds, beating the French there by a day. They held back, however, and permitted the latter to enter first as a matter of sentiment. The main objective had been reached, however, and the German communique of November 8 admitted for the first time in the four years of war that "the German line had been pierced."

When the armistice put a stop to hostilities on November 11, the battle line was completely east of the Meuse, the great four-track railroad line through Sedan and Mezieres, which was the heart of the enemy's lines of communication, had been cut, and the American forces were ready to launch another attack with the First Army in the direction of Longwy and with the Second Army, which was southeast of Verdun, toward Briey and Conflans. These operations, which were sure of success, would have outflanked Metz, the last German stronghold in Lorraine, and made necessary the withdrawal of all the enemy forces across the Rhine into Germany.

But our troops were forced to pay a bloody toll for their success in the Argonne. Twenty-two divisions were used by General Pershing to accomplish his purpose. These divisions were the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 26th, 28th, 29th, 32nd, 33rd, 35th, 37th, 42nd, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 89th, 90th, and 91st. With corps, army, special and replacement troops, about 1,200,000 Americans were directly or indirectly engaged in this great battle. The French used about 140,000 troops for their operations west of the Argonne and also north of Verdun. Against them and our troops were pitted 46 German divisions with a strength of approximately 600,000 men. The American casualties were about 125,000 while the German losses have been estimated at about 100,000.

Other interesting figures which have been compiled in regard to this great campaign of our army are as follows: Maximum penetration of the enemy's lines, 32 1-2 miles; villages and towns liberated, 150; daily average of artillery ammunition fired, 72,541; total artillery ammunition fired during the campaign, 3,408,725; prisoners captured, 316 officers, 15,743 men; material captured, 468 guns, 2864 machine guns, 177 trench mortars.

MAJOR GENERAL E. H. CROWDER

THE SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

The working of the selective service act, or the draft law, as it was more popularly known, in Knox County, was ample justification of the wisdom of its passage. It provided the majority of the man power, which Knoxville and Knox County gave to the war, while this drain was made with the least disturbance to the domestic and economic relations of their life. There was much opposition and prejudice against the law when it was enforced at the beginning, but its essential justice and democracy soon swept away this feeling which impeded its operation at first.

As the demands of the war machine became more imperative and men were called to the colors in large numbers in the spring and summer of 1918, it became apparent to the common sense and reason of all men that the draft system was the only feasible manner in which the nation's strength could be marshalled in the comparative order of its military and industrial importance. Furthermore, it was the only way in which sufficient men could have been mobilized in a short time to meet the grave emergency of the hour.

The volunteer system, which prevailed the first few months of the war, played havoc with the domestic and economic life of the nation, taking many who should have stayed at home in essential industries or to support dependent families, while leaving behind the great majority of man power which could have been spared most easily for the army. Voluntary enlistment of men within the draft ages was stopped, therefore, the latter part of 1917. Under the amended draft law, all men of military age were classified scientifically. Each man was forced to await his time and perform his military obligation only when his call, in orderly process, came to him.

All men of draft age were classified into five groups, those physically unfit being grouped into the fifth class, while those of the other four were arranged in the inverse order of their industrial and economic importance. Class I was the only group during the war from which men of Knox County were taken for military service. Those in the other three classes were men whose call to the colors was deferred on account of domestic and industrial reasons. They constituted a reserve which was available if actual military necessity demanded their services.

The first registration in Knox County on June 5, 1917, was made a great holiday affair in which public officials and leading private citizens, men and women of all classes, and boys and girls of all ages took part. Parades and patriotic addresses were features of the day. Those between the ages of 21 and 30 then went to booths and registered their names for military service. At Knox County Board No. 1 there were 1697 registrants; at Knox County No. 2, 1098; at Knoxville No. 1, 4152; and at Knoxville No. 2, 3052. The total of the registrants was exactly 9,999. At registrations held June 5, 1918, and August 24, 1918, of those who had reached the age of 21 since June 5, 1917, there were 1081 young men who enrolled themselves for service. At the final registration on September 12, 1918, of all men between 18 and 45, those who presented themselves and enrolled for military duty numbered 12,952. The total registration under the draft law in Knoxville and Knox County was 24,032. Of this number, 2708 or a little more than eleven per cent, were called to the colors and accepted at training camps. This number included both white and negro men, the latter being largely in the minority. Knoxville Board No. 1 sent the largest number into the service, 1246; Knoxville No. 2 was second with 702; Knox County No. 1 was third with 511; while Knox County No. 2 contributed 249.

Governor Rye, in naming the members of the four boards to administer the draft law in Knox County, was very fortunate in the selection of the personnel of each of them. The members came from all walks of life, and many of them made large sacrifices of both time and money to administer their offices faithfully and efficiently. They had a big task to accomplish, with many obstacles and influences to overcome, but they did their work fearlessly. With few exceptions they received the hearty support of the entire population.

The original members of Knoxville Board No. 1, which had jurisdiction over the first eleven wards of the city, were: Dr. W. S. Nash, chairman; Wiley L. Morgan, secretary; and A. W. Anderson, associate member. Mr. Morgan resigned shortly after his appointment and was succeeded by Rev. J. S. French, who served until the spring of 1918, when he entered the Y. M. C. A. work at Camp Sevier. J. W. Sullivan was appointed to succeed him and served until the board was discharged. Dr. Nash was chairman and medical adviser of the board until August 1, 1918, when he resigned to accept an appointment, with rank of major, as a national inspector, attached to the office of the Provost Marshal, General Crowder. Dr. W. F. Christenbery was appointed member and examining physician in his place. Joe P. Lackey, who had served as chief clerk of the board, also was appointed a member. In the reorganization, Mr. Sullivan was chosen chairman, Mr. Lackey, secretary, and A. W. Anderson and Dr. Christenbery, associate members.

The membership of Knoxville Board No. 2 was composed of Dr. H. E. Christenbery, chairman; Walter E. Mynderse, secretary; and Judge H. B. Lindsay, associate member. Dr. William T. DeSautelle was examining physician. Judge Lindsay was succeeded by T. E. Plyley in August, 1918. The latter served until the board was dismissed.

The two Knox County draft boards remained unchanged throughout the war period. Board No. 1 was composed of Col. William M. Epps, chairman; J. T. Henderson, secretary; and Dr. E. C. Lay, associate member and examining physician. The members of Board No. 2 were M. B. Byington, chairman; Dr. M. H. Lee, secretary and examining physician; and Major W. Hardin, associate member.

In cooperation with each board worked three other governmental agencies, which facilitated its work and assisted the registrants in filling out their questionnaires, giving them timely information in regard to their service in the army, and examining them physically. These agencies were the legal advisory boards, the medical advisory boards and the boards of instruction. All of the members worked without compensation and most often in conflict with their private affairs.

Each legal advisory board was composed of three reputable lawyers, who called to their assistance others of their profession as associate members when there was need of their services. These lawyers interpreted the terms of the draft law to the registrants, aided them in filling out the complex questionnaires, and assisted them in other matters pertaining to the legal duties required of them. Members of these advisory boards were: Knox County No. 1, Charles H. Smith, Chairman, L. H. Spillman, John C. Houk, D. M. Bright, Norman B. Morrell; Knox County No. 2, John W. Green, Chairman, W. J. Donaldson, William Baxter Lee; Knoxville No. 1, T. Asbury Wright, Chairman, James A. Fowler, John H. Frantz, Henry Hudson, secretary; Knoxville No. 2, Charles T. Cates, Jr., Chairman, John M. Thornburgh, D. C. Webb.

The examination of all registrants was far beyond the strength and ability of the one physician, who was member of each draft board. As a result, medical advisory boards were appointed for the draft boards throughout the country. They not only furnished general medical advice in the examination of registrants, but the specialist members rendered valuable aid in the detection of obscure physical defects. The doctors, like the lawyers, did all of this work without compensation. The members of the four Knox County medical boards were:

Knox County No. 1, W. S. Austin, Chairman, L. L. Sheddan, Secretary, S. F. Casenburg, A. J. Cottrell, J. H. Kincaid, R. B. DePue, E. H. Pierce; Knox County No. 2, W. H. L. White, Chairman, C. J. Carmichael, Secretary, A. G. Kern, H. H. McCampbell, W. K. Slater, W. W. Potter, Robert Patterson; Knoxville No. 1, Charles Huff Davis, Chairman, W. N. Lynn, Secretary, Ben B. Brabson, Walter Luttrell, W. R. Cochran; Knoxville No. 2, C. M. Capps, Chairman, A. R. McLendy, Secretary, B. B. Cates, W. A. Catlett.

In the summer of 1918, the draft boards were instructed to organize a third agency in connection with their work. These were the boards of instruction. The objects of these advisory boards were to put the drafted men into camp willing, loyal, intelligent, and sober, so that they would make more rapid steps in becoming good soldiers; to explain to them some of the reasons why this nation was at war and the issues that were involved; and to give them a thorough idea of how to avail themselves of the welfare agencies, as the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., war risk insurance bureaus, and allotment departments, so that they might keep in touch with their families. The instruction board of Knoxville Draft Board No. 1 was very active, as its members met three times each week and made addresses before all the outgoing men to camps.

Members of these boards of instruction were: Knoxville No. 1, Judge Hugh M. Tate, Chairman; David C. Chapman, military tactics; John R. Neal, military law; E. W. Fox, Y. M. C. A. secretary; Miss Josephine Reddish, Red Cross. Knoxville No. 2, James A. Fowler, Chairman, military law; A. D. Albright, physical instructor; David C. Chapman, military tactics; E. W. Fox, Y. M. C. A.

secretary; Miss Josephine Reddish, Red Cross. Knox County No. 1, Thomas J. Cline, Chairman, W. F. Miller, William Washburn. Knox County No. 2, L. M. G. Baker, Chairman, Robert Young, Roy Johnson.

The registrants were called before the draft boards in groups of from 20 to 50 each day. The first group appeared for examination on August 3, 1917. A surprising feature that the examinations brought forth was the number of men disqualified for military service on physical grounds. A great many were fit only for limited service in the army. In the early stages of the operation of the law, the physical defectives often ran as high as fifty per cent of the men examined. The exemption claims of those who were physically qualified were even higher. Most of them were based upon the ground of domestic dependency. A much smaller percentage asked to be excused from military service because of business affairs. The claims of those who asked exemption for either of these reasons were examined thoroughly by the local boards, and all of the facts in regard to each case were weighed carefully in making the final classification of the registrant.

If the registrant objected to the class in which he was placed, he had the right of appeal to the district board of five members, which considered appeals from East Tennessee counties. Under certain conditions, appeal could be taken from this board to higher authority. Government appeal agents from the four boards were: Knoxville No. 1, Forrest W. Andrews, J. H. Anderson; Knoxville No. 2, Edward F. Walsh, J. Harry Price; Knox County No. 1, Thomas L. Carty; Knox County No. 2, Judge H. N. Cate.

The first contingent of five per cent was called to report on September 5, 1917. It consisted of 16 men. Those who had the distinction of going to camp first were Frank Lockett from Knoxville Board No. 1; Titus Caruthers Schriver from Knoxville Board No. 2; Lee Monday from County Board No. 1; and Floyd N. Davis from County Board No. 2. The other twelve men followed within a few days.

Upon the departure of all men, both then and in the succeeding months, one member of the boards always accompanied them to the training camp. This was for the purpose of seeing that they arrived safely at their destination, were enrolled properly at the camps, and received a proper start in their new work. The majority of the men went to Camp Gordon at Atlanta, though quite a number were sent from time to time to Camp Buell in Kentucky, Camp Shelby in Mississippi, and Camp Jackson in South Carolina. Scattering detachments were called to other national army camps for special work.

Parades through the streets and receptions at the public buildings and at the railroad stations were held to give all men a joyful departure. The women at the Red Cross Canteen filled their pockets and bags with cigarettes, tobacco and good things to eat. Nothing was left undone to minister to their needs and comforts. Whether from the city or county, all were made to feel the deep, active interest of everyone in them and the righteousness of the cause in which they were going forth to fight.

The calls of the draft during the fall and winter of 1917 and the first few months of 1918 were rather light, because all the camps in the country were filled with national guard and regular army troops. There was no place in which they could be trained. In the late spring and summer of 1918, however, when these early divisions went overseas, and when the size of the army that was necessary and the desperation of the cause in which the allied forces were engaged became apparent through casualty lists and the demands of the army leaders for more men, the draft machinery at Washington doubled and redoubled the quotas and called incessantly for more men. These men, who were needed for the summer and fall campaigns of our armies, tarried only briefly in the cantonments in this country. They were outfitted and shipped out as fast as transports could be provided to carry them. In less than ninety days after they entered the service, many of these men were in the battle line. They went up as replacements in the divisions which had been thinned by heavy casualties in the Marne salient and the early fighting in the Argonne.

Of the fighting qualities of the draft men, the orders of General Pershing speak eloquently. The national army divisions were mentioned frequently. They were in the thick of the fighting in the Argonne Forest, the most prolonged and bitter campaign in which the American army ever took part. They were engaged in the reduction of the St. Mihiel salient, along the Marne and Aisne, in the Champagne sector, and on the other parts of the line held by American troops. They were scattered throughout the whole army.

While there may have been separate classifications and distinctions in America, in France the terms national guard, national army and regular army were but empty shells. Transfers, replacements, and shifts made these terms empty names. The former three grand divisions of the American army became hopelessly intermingled under the stress of war and needs of battle. The original regular and national guard divisions, which saw the earliest fighting, became thinned and depleted by the middle of the summer of 1918. To keep them in the line it was necessary to fill them to war strength after each battle with replacements of men who had recently come from America. As voluntary enlistment had been stopped after December 15, 1917, it was necessary to make these replacements with men who were drafted. After a few days with those who had had the benefit of battle experience, these men became real veterans, able to undergo any test and take part in any battle. The three groups of our fighting forces, between which there were sharp lines of distinction at home, became under a common peril one huge army, sharing the same dangers, undergoing the same hardships, and fighting for the same cause under the same flag.

FOURTH TENNESSEE INFANTRY

While this regiment was not called into federal service and, therefore, had no chance to participate in the activities at the front, it did its part in the winning of the war by the thorough instruction given its members, many of whom were drafted or enlisted later in other units and saw active service in this country, as well as overseas. Nearly every man who went into active service was quickly made a noncommissioned officer on account of the training he had received in the regiment.

Early in the fall of 1917, when the success of the allied cause looked anything but encouraging, Acting Secretary of War Ingram issued an order, authorizing the organization of national guard units in Tennessee with the distinct understanding that, if the exigencies existed which seemed to make the course advisable, these units were to be subject to the call or draft of the President for foreign service. Gov. Rye immediately called a conference of military men at Nashville and the decision was reached to organize one regiment of infantry. David C. Chapman, J. Wylie Brownlee, Frank L. West, W. Q. Johnston, N. E. Logan and H. F. Knox were appointed provisional officers for the Knoxville units. Messrs. Chapman and Brownlee at once visited 27 different towns in East Tennessee, addressing meetings in behalf of the proposed regiment. This recruiting work resulted, in less than 30 days, in the enlistment of 1,589 acceptable men. In the succeeding months, as men would drop out of the regiment on account of the draft or for other reasons, their places were filled, so that altogether 4,017 men were recruited and sworn into the regiment for service during the duration of the war.

The full quota for one regiment having been raised in East Tennessee, the regiment was designated the Fifth Tennessee Infantry, and Lieutenant-Colonel Chapman, who had been in command, was commissioned a full colonel of the organization on February 5, 1918. Mr. Brownlee was commissioned captain and appointed mustering officer. Accompanied by Col. Chapman, he visited the various towns in East Tennessee where companies had been organized and mustered these units into service during December, 1917.

The officers of the regiment and the towns in which companies were organized were as follows:

Colonel D. C. Chapman, Knoxville; Lieut.-Col. Milton B. Ochs, Chattanooga; Headquarters Company, Captain J. Wylie Brownlee, Knoxville; Supply Company, Knoxville, Captain William Q. Johnston; Machine Gun Company, Knoxville, Captain Charles L. Peckinbaugh, 1st Lieut. Robert L. Kern, 2nd Lieut. Thomas Bailey, 2nd Lieut. Wallace D. Boyd.

First Battalion—Major Frank L. West, Knoxville; Company A, Johnson City, Captain William H. Hodge, 1st Lieut. Grover Summers, 2nd Lieut. Joseph H. Crouch; Company B, Erwin, Captain Robert W. Vandergriff, 1st Lieut. Roy Tucker, 2nd Lieut. Luther C. Hurd; Company C, Greeneville, Captain William C. Hardin, 1st Lieut. Don H. McDaniel, 2nd Lieut. Robert W. Daugherty, 2nd Lieut. James A. Holley; Company D, LaFollette, Captain Lee J. Sergeant, 1st Lieut. William H. Noel, 2nd Lieut. G. B. Gallaher.

Second Battalion—Major C. H. Gillingham, Maryville; 1st Lieut. Earl Rodgers, Knoxville; Company E, Knoxville, Captain Earnest Logan, 2nd Lieut. Arthur J. Cockrell; Company F, Petros, Captain Arthur W. Evans, Captain Walton Y. Boswell, 1st Lieut. E. B. Patton, 2nd Lieut. W. H. Eblin; Company G, Maryville, Captain Edgar Teffeteller, 1st Lieut. James L. Maxey, 2nd Lieut. J. T. Tweed; Company H, Lenoir City, Captain C. E. Morelock, 1st Lieut. J. W. Bussell, Jr., 2nd Lieut. Samuel F. Carroll.

Third Battalion—Major H. M. Candler, Athens; 1st Lieut. H. F. Knox; Company I, Captain Bartlett Hagemeyer, 1st Lieut. Allen Davis, 2nd Lieut. Roy L. Gooch; Company K, Rockwood, Captain Leland Cook, 1st Lieut. James R. Tedder, 2nd Lieut. Harry C. Howard; Company L, Athens, Captain Charles F. Keith, 1st Lieut. Russell Huff, 2nd Lieut. C. C. Mahery; Company M, Cleveland, Captain Q. M. Smith, 1st Lieut. W. H. Rodgers, 2nd Lieut. C. A. Mee.

Sanitary Detachment, Major B. D. Bosworth, Knoxville; Major H. M. Cass, Johnson City. Chaplain, 1st Lieut. H. V. Carson, Knoxville.

During January, 1918, Colonel Chapman was busy securing armories in the various towns of East Tennessee for the local companies, the Knoxville companies being installed in the Briscoe building on State Street. Bi-weekly drills and military instruction were started with a rush, Col. Chapman and his staff making frequent inspection of the companies as the work progressed. Schools for commissioned and noncommissioned officers were held weekly under good instructors, and rapid progress was made in the work. Col. E. V. Smith, of the regular army, inspected the regiment during January, 1918, and declared that every requirement for federal recognition had been met. This recognition was finally extended on May 6 and full equipment was ordered from the quartermaster depots. On account of the enormous demands of the war, however, this equipment was not received until July, 1918.

During this period the draft age was from 21 to 31, so that all members of the national guard above or below these ages had voluntarily made themselves subject to call because of their enlistment. Many members of draft age were called into service by the county boards, thus depleting the ranks of both regiments in the state. From these two sources the regiment lost heavily both in officers and men. Among the officers who resigned to get into active service in training camps were Major West, Captain Brownlee, Captain Peckinbaugh, Lieuts. Kern, Bailey and Boyd, Captain Vandergriff, Lieut. Tucker, Lieut. Maxey, Lieut. Bussell, Captain Cook, Lieut. Tedder, Lieut. Howard and Captain Smith.

Owing to losses by the draft and the training camps, it was thought advisable in June, 1918, to consolidate the Fourth and Fifth Infantry Regiments into one. This was done and Colonel Chapman was placed in command of the consolidated regiment, which was designated the Fourth Tennessee Infantry. New officers were appointed from the other regiment to fill the vacancies, but the location of the companies remained the same, some consolidations being made to increase the strength of the units.

Every effort was made by the officers and the enlisted men of the regiment to get into federal service and see field duty. With this end in view, frequent trips were made to Washington by Col. Chapman, accompanied by Gov. Rye, Adjutant General Buckner, and officers of the regiment. Senators Shields and McKeller gave their assistance also in trying to get the War Department to call out the regiment.

In the fall of 1918 the regiment was ordered to go into encampment at Camp John Sevier near Fountain City. The rifle range was put in a good state of repair, the camp buildings and grounds prepared, and all arrangements made for the encampment October 7-22, 1918. The serious epidemic of influenza, which reached its height about that time, made it necessary to call off the encampment. After the signing of the armistice, Colonel Chapman resigned his command on November 23, 1918, and serious attempts to continue the military training with the companies were abandoned.

PICTORIAL SECTION

[NOTE:—The pictures shown in the following pages are from American, English and French official sources. The larger number, selected from several thousand made by the U. S. Signal Corps in France, show actual conditions on the front and in foreign camps. The few English and French pictures were passed by the censor as official].

"THE AMERICAN VANGUARD"

The first 5,000 Yankee soldiers to reach England, crossing Westminster Bridge after their historic march through London in August, 1917.

"LAFAYETTE, WE ARE HERE"

Soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces passing in review at the ceremonies in Paris on the naming of a street after President Wilson, July 4, 1918.

"SETTING UP DRILL"

Cross-section view of a group of 10,000 men in the training school at Camp Hancock, Ga., going through calisthenic exercises in cadence.

"THIS MAN'S ARMY"

Field artillery regiments assembled on the drill grounds preparatory to a review of the 20th Division, Camp Hancock, Ga.

"NEAR BELLICOURT"

View of ground over which Thirtieth Division fought to reach St. Quentin canal.

"ST. QUENTIN CANAL"

Looking northeast of Hindenburg Line and south of Bellicourt, France.

"VIEW OF BELLICOURT"

"PAST THE HINDENBURG LINE"

Members of Co. "K," 117th Infantry, digging themselves in for the night after an advance which started in the morning at Molain, France.

"CAPTURED"

German officers, captured by Americans, being conducted to headquarters for examination by intelligence officers.

"THE PEST OF FRANCE"

A member of the 117th Infantry waging war on our second greatest enemy in Europe—"the cooties."

"THE HINDENBURG TUNNEL"

Interior view, showing way Germans had tunnel closed and water of St. Quentin canal.

"LOOKING OUT FROM THE TUNNEL"

South end, east of Bellicourt, where German barrage caught American troops.

"ENGINEERS AT WORK"

This British company is building a bridge across stream so advance of army might continue.

"MOUTH OF HINDENBURG TUNNEL"

Looking north of St. Quentin Canal, and showing defensive works built by the Germans.

"PICKING OFF THE HUNS"

Sharpshooter of the Thirtieth Division, from behind a parapet of sod and debris, singles out targets for his rifle.

"SOME HUN DEVILTRY"

Huge crater caused by the explosion of mine planted and exploded by the Germans in their retreat before the Thirtieth Division.

"IN THE PRISON PENS"

Hundreds of German prisoners, captured by the Thirtieth Division, herded in a barbed wire stockade behind the lines.

"THE DEVASTATION OF WAR"

This picture, taken of ground fought over by the Thirtieth Division, shows the havoc wrought by artillery fire on the German trenches.

"A MINE CRATER"

Probably once part of a trench system, now a cess-pool of stagnant water in Flanders.

"THE CATHEDRAL AT YPRES"

All that remained of this religious treasure, after Germans had shelled it for four years.

"PRESSING THE HUN RETREAT"

Americans streaming northward in the St. Mihiel salient. Notice the shell-raked ground.

"A GERMAN TRAP"

While men were repairing a road blown up by the enemy, a buried shell exploded in their midst. This picture was snapped while the men were seeking cover.

"ACTION FRONT"

Yankee battery of 155 mm. howitzers in advanced position. They have a range of five to ten miles.

"AN INFANTRY CHARGE"

Contrary to the popular conception, a modern "charge" is devoid of heroics. These men were advancing under fire near Romagne-Sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

"ADVANCING WITH RIFLE GRENADES"

American soldiers going forward to the attack in the operations in the Argonne Forest.

"ESTABLISHING THE ENTENTE"

A typical scene in the French towns where Yankee soldiers were billeted.

"THE OBSERVER"

A close-up view of a balloon near the front line trenches in France.

"FIRE"

This 340 mm. gun, manned by Americans, hit two German army corps headquarters 18 miles away.

"THE FIRST DAY AT ST. MIHIEL"

Temporary trenches dug by Americans on the first night of the St. Mihiel drive, near Beney, Meuse.

"MOPPING UP"

Doughboys pausing for a rest in the Argonne Forest among the stumps of what once was a beautiful grove. This ground had just been captured from the Germans.

"ATTACKING THE MACHINE GUN NEST"

American sharpshooters advancing through a town near Cunel against an enemy detachment hidden among the trees overlooking the road.

"OVER THE TOP"

A machine gun crew creeping toward the enemy lines through the woods. A realistic picture of an actual front-line advance.

"AT ST. MIHIEL"

A Yankee machine gun company passing through the ruins of a village leveled by artillery fire in the St. Mihiel salient.

"OUTPOST DUTY"

American outposts in the Hecken Sector of Alsace, watching for the enemy. One is armed with a rifle grenade and one with a Chauchat machine gun.

"DUG IN"

American infantrymen defending a farm near St. Benoit, Meuse, in the St. Mihiel salient. The machine gun outposts are seen in the rear.

"A SILHOUETTE AT VERDUN"

American engineers on the banks of the Aire River at work upon a temporary bridge "Somewhere in the Argonne" northwest of Verdun.

"IN COMBAT FORMATION"

Infantrymen advancing toward the German lines in an attack upon the Huns.

"THE CATHEDRAL AT ST. QUENTIN"

In the wake of the Hun invaders. The destruction wrought on the cathedral is typical of the Hun vandals.

"AT THE ALTAR OF JOAN OF ARC"

A Yankee doughboy and a French poilu doing homage to the heroine of France.

"THE PHOSPHOROUS BOMB"

An explosion in the trenches during a night attack by the Germans.

"BEHIND THE BARRAGE"

The first wave of American infantry advancing behind a rolling barrage. The photographer, Lt. Ralph Estep, was killed shortly after he had made this picture.

"SEARCHING A PRISONER"

American intelligence officers relieving a captured German of papers of military value.

"A REST ON THE BATTLEFIELD"

American infantrymen resting at the end of a successful day in the St. Mihiel salient. The dark patches of fresh earth are shell holes and shelters hastily dug for protection.

"IN BELLEAU WOOD"

A twilight view of No Man's Land, taken a few weeks after the American victory at the spot where the "Hindenburg Line" was definitely broken in one of the hardest engagements of the war.

"THE BATTLE LINE"

A famous National Guard Regiment in the front line trenches at Chaussers, France.

"THE TRAIL TO THE FRONT"

Slightly wounded Americans returning on foot to the ambulances in the rear. This picture illustrates the character of the ground over which Americans fought.

"AFTER THE BATTLE"

A German gun position immediately following its capture by Americans, showing the 77 m.m. field piece and its dead gunners.

"IN THE SECOND LINE TRENCH"

Americans setting in position a French "one-pounder." This gun has a maximum range of 1½ miles and can fire 28 rounds a minute.

"ON THE ALERT"

Ready for an attack in the American trenches before Mulhouse, Hecken Sector, Germany.

"A BIVOUAC IN THE WOODS"

An infantry company in "pup tents," in the woods. The trees prevent observation.

"ON THE WAY TO BATTLE"

American infantrymen, having pitched their shelter tents for the night, water their horses in the stream.

"GENERAL PERSHING AND KING GEORGE"

Returning with their staffs from a military review at Molliens-au-Bois, France.

"THE SHARPSHOOTER"

A team of American doughboys holding an outpost in Alsace with a French machine gun.

"SEARCHING PRISONERS"

Thirtieth Division "doughboys" hunting souvenirs on Germans a few hundred yards behind the line.

"A '75' IN ACTION."

This famous French gun is firing into a woods three miles away. The camouflage overhead conceals its position.

"A BREATHING SPELL"

After capturing the German second line trenches in a section of the Forest of Argonne, these Americans enjoy a well-earned rest.

"BRITISH RAILROAD GUN"

Ramming home shell in this big cannon, which has special railway mounting.

"WAR'S DEVASTATION"

Remnant of a once beautiful grove near the village of Pozieres, France.

"HEAVY BRITISH TANK"

Moving ahead of infantry to find and destroy German machine gun positions.

"SOME HUN FACES"

Note the cruel, savage expression which these prisoners, captured among last drives, have.

"A GERMAN STRONGPOINT"

These concrete shelters, built the entire length of the Hindenburg Line, made it difficult to dislodge the Germans.

"A BAD PLACE ON THE ROAD"

A Yankee ammunition wagon northeast of St. Mihiel, stuck in the mud and holding up the advance of the whole column.

"LOAD"

Men loading a mobile railroad gun, 13.9 inches calibre, on the Argonne front. This gun was manned by 122 men, working in cooperation with aerial observers.

"THE ADVANCE IN THE ARGONNE"

Engineers at work repairing a bridge across the Aire River, which had been dynamited by the Germans in their retreat.

"SIGNALLING AN AEROPLANE"

"A BALLOON EXPLOSION"

A remarkable snapshot taken at the instant of explosion of a captive kite balloon. The gas was ignited by the friction of the bag against the ground while being deflated.

"STALKING THE HUN"

American raiding party making its way to a Mechlinburg trench, captured in a former raid.

"ADVANCING THROUGH MONTFAUCON"

Showing the house formerly used by the German Crown Prince as an observatory during the famous battle of Verdun.

"AN ADVANCE THROUGH THE WOODS"

Browning machine gunners in battle practice. These rifles fire 400 shots a minute.

"THE MORNING ATTACK"

In the haze of the dawn, a battery of American field artillery in the Argonne pounds the retreating German lines.

"A HAND GRENADE ASSAULT"

American soldiers on the Piave front hurling a shower of bombs into the Austrian trenches near Varage, Italy.

"THE SMOKE SCREEN"

American infantrymen advancing in attack behind an artillery smoke barrage.

"ON THE HUN TRAIL"

American and French observers watch German retreat from St. Mihiel salient.

"THE CHOW WAGON"

On the first day of the St. Mihiel drive, this kitchen, advancing in the rear of our army, served breakfast; moved forward 12 miles and served lunch; moved again and served dinner that night.

"BUDDIES"

A wounded soldier receiving first aid from a comrade.

"THE ADVANCE UP HILL 240"

Yankee doughboys advancing up the slope near Exermont by "digging in" at intervals of every few yards.

"OBSERVATION BALLOON"

This monster of the air is being hauled down after peering several hours over German lines.

"HOW TOMMY IS FED"

Hot stew is being served in buckets to these soldiers in the front line trenches.

"ATTACKING AN AIR RAIDER"

French 75-millimeter anti-aircraft gun in action against German aeroplanes overhead.

"A DRESSING STATION"

First-aid is given to the more seriously wounded men. German prisoners were compelled to carry the stretchers to the rear.

"SHELLING THE ROAD"

Boche shells bursting above a road in the Argonne in an attempt to interrupt the march of American field artillery.

"ON THE ROAD TO THE FRONT"

Yankee troops back of Verdun boarding motor trucks bound for the Argonne battle front.

"SHARPSHOOTERS"

Yankee riflemen in a "nest," picking off German soldiers on the outer edges of Villers, France.

"A SUNKEN ROAD"

These dugouts were captured from the Boches in fall campaign of 1918. Notice sandbags for protection.

"IN THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS"

Soldiers wounded in action receiving medical treatment, in an old church near Neuville, Meuse.

"SEARCHLIGHTS"

Mobile anti-aircraft searchlights, with 24-inch lenses, in operation by the Engineer Corps, Washington Barracks, Washington, D. C.

"FIRING IN THE MEUSE VALLEY"

Doughboys in the front line trench taking advantage of the camouflage left by the routed Germans, who took up their positions about 1200 yards from this point.

"FILLING CANTEENS"

A halt on the line of march during the action in the Argonne. The men are quenching their thirst from a stream near Boureuilles.

"HAPPY"

Something struck this American negro soldier as funny, and he paused to laugh even during the gas mask drill.

"PRISONERS CARRYING WOUNDED"

Captured Huns carrying their own comrades to a dressing station under an armed guard during the battle of the Argonne.

"THE KAISER'S LAST REVIEW"

This picture, made from a postcard taken from a German officer by Sergeant Frederick W. Welcker, a Knoxville man, shows the Kaiser and Crown Prince inspecting a Hun Company behind the lines.

"THE IRON CROSS"

A stone dugout entrance, built by the Germans in 1914 on the side of Montsec. An underground passage led from this spot to an observation point on the crest.

"THE BRIDGE AT ST. MIHIEL"

This dugout, in the shadow of a wrecked railway bridge, at Flirey, quartered Yankee officers.

"HIT"

The church at Romagne, Meuse, during the period the town was under constant shell fire.

"GENERAL PERSHING AND MARSHAL FOCH"

Two of the great leaders of the Allied forces at the headquarters of Marshal Ferdinand Foch at Val des Ecoliers, Chaumont.

"OUR FLEET AT SEA"

The battleships and cruisers that stood guard with British in North Sea to prevent escape of German fleet.

"DEPTH CHARGES"

Anti-submarine bombs loaded on the destroyer, Stockton, for use against the Huns.

"THE DEPTH BOMB"

Explosion of a 300-pound anti-submarine charge, fired from the U. S. S. Whipple.

"MINE FIELDS"

These were at Inverness, Scotland.

"A SUB-CHASER"

This type of boat was a terror to enemy submarines.

"HOMEWARD BOUND"

Was stationed at Camp Jackson until ordered overseas August 7, 1918. Participated in the St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne Offensives. Discharged July 22, 1919, with rank of private.

OTHERS IN THE SERVICE

In addition to those in the service, whose photographs and records are shown in the preceding pages, there were more than 2,000 other men from Knox County in the various branches of military, naval and air activity whose photographs and records it was impossible to obtain, though every effort was made to do so.

The names of these men are given below. There are some inaccuracies in spelling, as the names were taken from rosters, records, newspapers, and files. These errors have been eliminated as far as possible through consulting the Knoxville city directory, but a large number of the names did not appear in it. Many of the men lived in the rural districts of the county.

The consolidation of this list with the preceding one shows that approximately 5,000 of the men and boys of Knox County were in federal service between the declaration of war April 6, 1917, and the conclusion of the armistice November 11, 1918. In addition, there were many hundreds of men and women who did war work, but who did not take the federal oath or put on a uniform.

"OUR WAR REPRESENTATIVES"

The GREATEST MOTHER

THE RED CROSS

No civilian activity of the great world war aroused so entirely the popular interest and made a so direct, human appeal to the great mass of people in Knoxville and Knox County—irrespective of creed, color, or station in life—as the Red Cross. Its international emblem, the symbol of mercy, justice and humanity, evoked an overwhelming response whenever a call was made in its behalf. People literally asked to contribute to its cause with their money or to give their time and labor for its sake. Its motives were so high and so pure that no one ever questioned what became of the wealth that was poured out to relieve the sufferings of a war-torn and grief-stricken world.

Never an appeal of any kind for assistance was made that it was not more than answered. If workers were needed, there were more than there was physical room in which they could labor comfortably. If contributions of money for the support of the national and local chapter were necessary, they were far beyond what was asked. In the first campaign, Knox County was asked to raise $75,000 as its quota. The contributions were $95,000. In the second campaign, in which an equal amount was asked, the subscriptions were $80,000 within three hours after the campaign had started. They reached approximately $125,000 before the avalanche of gifts stopped.

But great as were the donations of money to the Red Cross by Knox County—more than $200,000 was collected in the two campaigns—the hundreds of thousands of hours of unselfish, loving work were infinitely greater. Of the more than 16,000 members in the county, over 6,000 were engaged actively in Red Cross work. Ninety-six women and men were awarded badges for doing 800 hours of work, twenty-six women received them for 1,600 hours of labor, while eleven women gave 2,400 hours each of their time and strength in the interest of the work. These figures do not take into account the thousands of women and girls who did less than these amounts, either in the privacy of their homes during leisure moments or in the regularly organized work rooms of the Red Cross chapter.

An insight into the magnitude of the work accomplished by the Knoxville chapter, its branch chapter in St. John's Episcopal Church, and its three score auxiliaries, is given in the final report to the southern division headquarters of the national organization. From the incorporation of the chapter on February 7, 1917, until April 30, 1919, the sum of $88,541.82 was collected for local use, while $77,748.05 of this amount was disbursed for materials and other necessary expenses. In the surgical dressing department, 607,368 articles were made at a cost of $8,282.20. The garment department turned out 30,238 articles at an approximate cost of $17,500. The knitting department made 25,703 articles at a cost of $12,572.98. The St. John's branch made 54,654 compresses, 16,876 pleated bandages, 1,000 hospital garments, and knitted 447 pairs of socks and 155 sweaters. The civilian relief department gave assistance to 3,128 families by means of loans, visits, medical attention, legal advice, and correspondence in regard to allotments, allowances, and insurance. The loans amounted to $4,579.71, of which $2,396.07 was repaid by those to whom they had been made.

Mrs. N. E. Logan was the first director general of woman's work in the Red Cross chapter. She served until May 1, 1918, when she went to France in the canteen service. She was succeeded by Mrs. J. Stewart French, who served until the active work closed. There were eight departments into which this work was divided—surgical dressings, garments, knitting, military relief, civilian relief, education, canteen, and junior departments.

The surgical dressing department started in humble quarters in the rear of the Board of Commerce. Mrs. Charles Huff Davis was supervisor, with Mrs. Benjamin D. Bosworth as assistant. A second move was necessary in the interest of more room, while a third one was made into the "war quarters" in Market Hall, where there were accommodations for 300 women to work at one time. The making of dressings was carried on both day and night.

Mrs. A. J. Albers was the first superintendent of the garment department, but she was succeeded by Mrs. W. A. McBath, who gave almost a year of her time to the work. This was one of the most interesting of the departments, for the garments were cut from the raw cloth by an electric cutter, operated solely by women, sewed, inspected and packed, ready for shipment to foreign hospitals. They turned out the finished product, ready for a patient to put on.

The knitting department had an humble origin, starting in a small room in the Lyceum building. From that it grew to large proportions under the supervision of Mrs. Walter McCoy. Nearly all of the work was done in individual homes, hundreds of women taking home skeins of yarn and knitting gloves, sweaters and socks in odd moments when there were no other duties. The total of their labors was more than 25,000 finished articles.

The civilian relief department met a great need in attendance to the wants and welfare of those who had relatives in some branch of federal service. More than 3,000 families, many of them needy, were assisted regularly from June 1, 1917, to May 1, 1919. Service rendered to these families included financial relief, visits to homes for various purposes, medical attention, legal advice, and correspondence regarding allotments, allowances, and insurance. The record committee instructed 800 drafted men in filling out allotment and allowance blanks. Loans of about $4,500 were made to needy families, of which $2,400 afterward was collected. Mrs. Albert G. Hope was chairman of this department until January, 1918, when she was succeeded by Mrs. J. Walter Wright.

The military relief committee, with Richard K. Gibson as chairman, gave its assistance to those in the service who were in need of help. Before the local guardsmen went to Camp Sevier, they were supplied with necessary clothing and medical supplies. After they arrived in camp, the committee continued its supervision of them by importuning the government for heavier and warmer clothing during the severe winter. Working in connection with the canteen, a relief booth was installed at the Southern depot where soldiers' packages were looked after, tickets exchanged, the sick and needy helped, and meals and lodging furnished. Loans were made to many soldiers who were temporarily short of funds.

During the influenza epidemic, medicine, supplies and clothing were furnished to the troops encamped at the University of Tennessee and at Chilhowee Park. Soldiers in hospitals were visited and relatives informed of their health.

In response to the need for trained workers, more than a score of members of the Red Cross Chapter volunteered for canteen, nursing or executive work. On the opposite page are shown the photographs of eleven of them. They are: (1)-Fred. A. Ault, Deputy Comptroller of the National Red Cross at Washington from May, 1918, to July, 1919, who had, in that capacity, final review and approval of all Red Cross expenditures; (2)-E. W. Ogden, former president and one of the organizers of the Knoxville Chapter, who went to France in 1917 and served for a year in Red Cross work; (3)-Mrs. E. W. Ogden, who also saw a year of foreign service in the direction of Red Cross work in France; (4)-Miss Julia E. Hoyne, Red Cross nurse who went overseas in November, 1918; (5)-Miss Anna Magee Sanford, who did canteen work in France from July, 1918, to April, 1919; (6)-Miss Margaret McKinney, who was also overseas in canteen work for the Red Cross from November, 1918, to August, 1919; (7)-Miss Ella Williams, a canteen worker, who served in France from January, 1918, to March, 1919, in French and American canteens; (8)-Miss Anne Gettys, also a canteen worker in France for six months; (9)-Mrs. N. E. Logan, director of woman's work in the Knoxville Red Cross Chapter until her departure in July, 1918, for Europe, where she managed canteens at Bordeaux, France, and Treves, Germany; (10)-Miss Stella Wade, Red Cross nurse at Camp Jackson from August to December, 1918; (11)-Miss Mary Rachel Shackelford, who did Red Cross nursing at Camp McClellan and Camp Wadsworth during the war.

The Junior Red Cross, organized early in 1918, grew into large proportions and did splendid work. Thirty-one auxiliaries were organized with a total membership of about 12,000. These were principally in the city and county schools. More than $3,000 was raised and disbursed by the children in their work. Sixty French war orphans were adopted and provided for during a period of two years. In the manual training departments of the schools, the boys and girls made packing boxes for surgical dressings, applicator sticks for use in surgical packets, and other useful articles. The girls knitted sweaters, wristlets, and quilt squares. A total of 106,027 articles was turned out by members of the Junior Red Cross.

No branch of the Red Cross Chapter was more popular or filled a more direct need than the canteen at the railroad station, organized early in 1918 by Mrs. A. F. Sanford, and conducted later under the direction of Mrs. E. E. Norris and Mrs. E. C. Gothard. Between 300,000 and 400,000 troops, which passed through Knoxville enroute to camps or returning home to hospitals from the battle field, were served by the canteen. Regular shifts of workers stayed on duty seven days in the week from six o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night. No matter what kind of weather or what the hour, every train was met and refreshment offered to all men in uniform. During the months the canteen was in operation, the sum of $11,927.91 was expended in buying supplies and equipment. An appropriation of $2,500 was made by the Red Cross chapter, but the rest was contributed by patriotic citizens.

However, the donations of money were a tiny mite compared to the value of gifts of food made by housewives of the city and county and by the wholesale fruit houses. Jellies, preserves, sandwiches, pastries, fruits, and all kinds of delicacies were contributed in season and out of season by those who wished to do "their bit" in this way. No man in uniform was ever allowed to pass through the railroad station without a uniformed worker offering him cigarettes, coffee, pies, or any other delicacy that was in stock at the time. It made no matter whether he was a Tennessean or a native of another state. The uniform was the "open sesame" for a shower of attention by the canteen workers.

This personal attention, this kindness and untiring attention, this cordiality shown to all alike made the canteen a mighty instrument in maintaining a high morale among the troops, as well as ministering to their material needs. Often a home-sick and discouraged soldier, far away from home and loved ones, poured out his woes into the sympathetic ear of some canteen worker, who gave him encouragement and sent him smiling on his way.

In addition to these kindly services, first aid was rendered to 370 soldiers, 87 were taken from trains to hospitals, guides were furnished for detachments which had a few hours between trains and which wished to take walks over the city, telegrams were sent to relatives, more than 1,000 conducted to the Y. M. C. A. for baths and swims, while hundreds of thousands of post cards were given to men on which to write home.

Ossoli Circle, shortly after war was declared, took up the making of hospital garments among its membership. This work was thoroughly organized, perfected and continued until the last days of 1917, when it was merged with the central garment makers' department of the Red Cross. The circle thereafter devoted its time to other war work. Its most notable achievement, however, was the formation of 35 auxiliaries among the churches of the city and county, and among the county seats of the surrounding counties.

The only auxiliary of the Knoxville chapter that grew to the proportion of being raised to a branch in rank was the one organized in August, 1917, among the membership of St. John's Episcopal Church. The auxiliary started and kept through to its end the same board of officers. They were Dr. Walter C. Whitaker, president; R. K. Gibson, chairman of finance; Fritz Staub, chairman of relief work; D. M. Chambliss, chairman of supplies; George F. Harrison, secretary and treasurer. From August until November, 1917, the sewing rooms in the Lyceum building were used, but thereafter the auditorium of the parish house was converted into a work room in which bandages and surgical dressings were made. On April 1, 1918, in recognition of its fine work, the St. John's auxiliary became the St. John's branch of the Knoxville chapter. It was entirely self-supporting and did all kinds of Red Cross work. During the twelve months of active operation, the following articles were turned out by the women of this branch: 54,654 compresses, 16,876 plaited bandages, 1,000 hospital garments, 587 pads and belts, 60 sweaters, 38 sponges, 12 bathrobes, 447 pairs of socks, and 155 sweaters. This made a total of approximately 75,000 articles. Many of the officers and instructors in the parent chapter came from St. John's Church.

In conclusion, it should be noticed that the Knoxville chapter of the Red Cross was in the field and working before war was declared on April 6, 1917. Due to the efforts principally of Mrs. N. E. Logan, an organization had been perfected two months earlier, on February 6, and therefore work was well under way when the formal declaration came. The first officers were E. W. Ogden, president; Powell Smith, vice-president; N. E. Logan, treasurer; and Mrs. C. M. McClung, secretary. The directorate was composed of George Blow, Fred Bonham, N. E. Logan, Powell Smith, A. H. Steere, W. A. Schoenfield, Ben Morton, Curtis B. Johnson, E. W. Ogden, Mrs. Lena Warner, and Mrs. Lucy Templeton.

In the two years of exceedingly busy work which followed, there were many changes of officers and directors. Mr. Ogden resigned the presidency on October 1, 1917, to go to France in the Red Cross work. He was succeeded by Fred Ault, who served until March 19, 1918, when John M. Thornburgh became the active head of the chapter. After serving a year as treasurer, Mr. Logan was succeeded by Fred Ault, who, in turn, was succeeded by William Lyons. Mrs. McClung retired in 1919 after giving two years of her time as secretary of the chapter. Mrs. E. W. Ogden, who had returned from France as a Red Cross worker, was chosen in her place.

The directorate during the two years of active work was composed at one time or another of the following: Mr. and Mrs. N. E. Logan, Fred Bonham, Mrs. Lena Warner, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Ogden, A. H. Steere, Mrs. L. D. Tyson, D. A. Rosenthal, E. D. Albers, R. K. Gibson, John M. Thornburgh, William Lyons, Mrs. W. McBath, Mrs. J. Stewart French, Mrs. Walter McCoy, Mrs. B. D. Bosworth, A. P. Frierson, Wiley L. Morgan, Mrs. Henry Kelso, Mrs. Clyde Gothard, Dan Chambliss, F. J. Callan, Mrs. C. M. McClung, Mrs. Albert Hope, Mrs. C. H. Davis, Fred Ault, G. H. Clark, Mrs. Walter Wright, and Mrs. Kenneth Gilpin.

LIBERTY LOANS

In the five national Liberty Loan campaigns to finance the war, Knox County not only went "over the top", but in each of them its citizens bought more bonds than the government asked of them. The total subscriptions in five loans were approximately $13,500,000, though the county's quota was only slightly in excess of $10,000,000. Add to these subscriptions more than $2,000,000 invested in war savings stamps and the loans from Knox Countians to the federal government for the prosecution of the war reached the huge sum of more than $15,000,000.

The sale of so many government securities was made possible by the splendid selling organization built up and perfected in each succeeding campaign by Hon. T. Asbury Wright, who was chairman for Knox County in each of the five loans. He was the only county chairman in the Sixth Federal Reserve District who served consecutively through all of these campaigns. He virtually gave up his private business during them to further the sale of the bonds. Thanks to his constructive, organizing ability, backed by liberal space contributed by patriotic individuals, firms and by the newspapers themselves, the vital necessity of participating in the loans was carried to every home in the city and county.

Mr. Wright was assisted by an executive committee composed of the presidents of the Knoxville banks—William S. Shields, Frank L. Fisher, S. B. Luttrell, Joseph P. Gaut, E. E. McMillan, J. Allen Smith, Hu M. Johnston, W. H. Sterchi, Charlton Karns, J. J. Ashe, and, during the Fourth and Fifth Loans, Robert S. Young, president of the American National Bank. Samuel V. Carter, who was zone chairman for 20 of the upper East Tennessee counties, gave his assistance and support in each of the campaigns. These men, together with other officials of their banks, did yeoman service.

In the Fourth and Fifth Loans, which were considerably the largest, Mr. Wright organized a ward and district system for the purpose of getting in contact with every citizen in the city and county." Knoxville was divided into four divisions, while the county constituted a fifth. Matt G. Thomas was placed in command of the First Division; G. L. Price of the Second; J. L. Deaver of the Third; E. R. Wade of the Fourth; while John L. Boyd had charge of the county, or Fifth Division. Each general had under him a colonel, lieutenant-colonel, captain and several lieutenants. These officers in the various divisions, wards and precincts were:

Division No. 1—Colonel, Richard K. Gibson; Lieutenant-Colonel, Floyd Haun; Captains—1st Ward, U. D. Beeler; 2nd Ward, W. S. Hall; 3rd Ward, James E. Thompson; 4th Ward, Charles M. Thomas; 12th Ward, Edward Briscoe; 25th Ward, J. Park Vestal; 26th Ward, Chas. C. Rutherford.

Division No. 2—Colonel, Charles H. Harvey; Lieutenant-Colonel, W. R. Johnson; Captains—5th Ward, James E. Hickman; 6th Ward, Edgar George; 7th Ward, George Chandler; 8th Ward, Mel Miller; 13th Ward, J. C. White; 14th Ward, B. L. Johnson.

Division No. 3—Colonel, V. N. Hacker; Lieutenant-Colonel, Sam V. Minskey; Captains—9th Ward, James Waters; 10th Ward, C. M. Mitchell and W. W. Woodruff, Jr.; 22nd Ward, C. E. Randall; 24th Ward, Arthur Groves.

Division No. 4—Colonel, E. H. Scharringhaus; Lieutenant-Colonel, Jesse E. Miller; Captains—11th Ward, James M. Rule; 15th Ward, Edwin McLemore; 16th Ward, J. W. Beam; 17th Ward, Dr. A. D. Albright; 18th Ward, Boyd Hicks; 19th Ward, Rev. James C. Shipe; 21st Ward, Hal H. Clements; 23rd Ward, W. R. Ryno.

Division No. 5—Colonel, C. H. Baker; Lieutenant-Colonel, Powell Smith; Community Captains—Asbury, W. H. Moore; Anderson, S. O. Houston; Bearden, Dr. H. M. Lee; Carter's, P. J. Gambill; Gallaher's, H. B. Walker; Corryton, Dr. A. L. Foster; Farragut, Adam Phillips; Fountain City, A. F. Mahan; Gihb's, R. H. George; Hardin Valley, George B. Hardin; Hall's, R. Ledgerwood; Heiskell, S. J. Messamore; Inskip, Dr. J. B. Parker; Karns, W. B. Cobb; Kimberlin Heights, Sam Johnson; Mascot, Hugh R. McElvin; Mt. Olive, R. E. Masterson; New Hope-well, Mack Haynes; Paulette, John Tedford; Powell Station, Dr. G. N. Harrell; Riverdale, Dr. J. W. Drinnen; Stock Creek, R. R. Rule; Third Creek, J. H. Bradshaw; Washington, George O. Cardwell; Smithwood, A. C. Grinn; Thorne Grove, John Brown.

In the Fourth and Fifth Loans especially the commercial travelers of Knoxville did splendid service. Their two organizations, the T. P. A. and the U. T. C., under the leadership of E. W. Neal, Frank May, J. B. Criswell and W. D. Hogan, worked effectively and harmoniously with the Liberty Loan organization built up by Mr. Wright. As experienced salesmen they reached large numbers of men and women and sold thousands of dollars worth of the bonds.

As a further means of reaching every home and approaching every man and woman in Knox County, Mr. Wright brought two other strong agencies to bear in the latter campaigns. These organizations were the Four Minute Men and the Boy and Girl Scouts. The Four Minute Men campaigned the theatres, moving picture houses and other places of assembly in the city while in the county they stumped every village and cross roads. The Boy and Girl Scouts, under the able leadership of John M. Gore, Scout Executive, proved effective salesmen in all the campaigns in which they took part.

The first loan campaign was ushered in the latter part of May, 1917. There was little formal organization for the sale of bonds. The subscriptions were largely from the wealthy citizens and the banks. They were received through the banks up until the final days of the campaign when eighteen teams of Boy Scouts took the field and sold $153,000 of the bonds by the end of the drive on June 15. No quota was fixed definitely, but the total voluntary subscriptions amounted to $1,246,555.

The second loan campaign four months later, beginning October 1 and continuing until October 27, saw the creation of the first real bond sales organization. In addition to Mr. Wright as chairman, Jos. P. Gaut was elected vice-chairman, and Mrs. Joseph H. Anderson was made head of the woman's committee. J. Pike Powers, Jr., was named director of the Four Minute Men and John M. Gore organized the Boy Scouts for a more intensive campaign. The quota assigned to Knox County was $1,200,000. The sales amounted to $1,838,400, almost fifty per cent more than the quota assigned.

The third loan was equally as great a success. Practically the same organization, which had been built up in the previous campaigns, was used to float this one, which began April 6, 1918, and closed on May 4. Mr. Wright continued his work as director-general of the whole campaign, but Mrs. John W. Hudson succeeded Mrs. Anderson as general chairman of the woman's department. Mrs. W. C. Ross was named to push the sale of bonds among the women of the county districts. The "Minute Women" also entered the campaign, making one minute speeches daily on Gay Street and at all public meetings. Mrs. E. T. Sanford, assisted by Mrs. Herbert Hall, was in charge of this phase of the work, while Harry R. Ryder succeeded J. Pike Powers, Jr., as director of the Four Minute Men campaign. Ten teams of men and the same number of women canvassed the city and county in selling bonds. The women alone reported sales of about $900,000. The total subscriptions were $2,417,100. The quota was only $2,000,000. The most encouraging feature of this campaign was the number of people who participated in it. Final figures showed that 12,880 bought bonds.

The fourth loan in the fall of 1918, when our armies were making deep gains daily and a wave of victorious exaltation was sweeping the whole country, outdistanced all the others in the enthusiasm it provoked and the ease with which nearly as many bonds were sold as in the three previous campaigns combined. Page after page of advertising, splendid war posters, furnished by the national loan organization, letters, personal appeals, exhortations from every platform in Knox County by the very best speakers, all these agencies, with the psychology of the moment of approaching victory, made this loan tremendously popular.

The central sales organization again was headed by Mr. Wright, while Mrs. Samuel G. Shields made an effective chairman of the Knox County woman's committee. The subcommittees were the same as in the preceding loan. Ministers gave their support from the pulpit, all kinds of street advertising were employed, a street fair, in which loan booths were established, was responsible for the sale of several hundred thousand dollars' worth of bonds, and scores of speakers toured the mills and factories, the stores and the rural districts for the loan. Boy and Girl Scouts canvassed both homes and streets. The schools organized bond clubs. The commercial travelers gave of their time unsparingly. In the closing days, a "dynamite" committee, composed of influential citizens, made large sales that could not otherwise have been made.

The flood of subscriptions on the last day of the campaign fairly swamped the banks, which received them. The quota of $3,685,000, which had seemed impossible to reach when the campaign started, was far surpassed. When all the subscriptions had been counted, it was found that the sales amounted to $4,858,950. The number of subscribers was 23,985. Practically one out of every four men, women and children in the city and county had bought a bond of some denomination.

Sales of the notes of the Fifth, or Victory Loan, as it was called, was much harder than in the preceding campaigns, when war was still being waged. The heat of a great victory had cooled, thousands of soldiers were returning, and, furthermore, a great many of those who had made actual personal sacrifice to buy in the earlier campaigns, did not feel equal to the burden which the final one would entail. There was a wide-spread feeling also that the money interests of the country, which did not subscribe early in the campaign, would more than take the loan in the final hours of the drive because of the high rate of interest and the exemption from taxation, which this loan afforded.

The quota set for Knox County was $2,832,450. When the subscriptions reached about $1,500,000, the sales fell off and popular interest and participation lagged. The "dynamite" committee, composed of teams of two men each who had access to the sources of wealth in the city and county, again was called into action and, with five hours of vigorous canvassing among the larger interests, the quota was almost reached. The banks underwrote the rest, while late popular subscriptions carried the total to approximately $3,100,000.

The organization was somewhat different in this campaign. Mr. Wright again gave his time and services as chairman of the central committee, but Mrs. James H. Anderson, who had directed the woman's share of the work in the second loan, succeeded Mrs. Shields, who had gone out of the city, as chairman of the Knox County woman's committee. Henry Hudson and Mrs. W. P. Davis were directors of the men's and women's five minute speakers, while John R. Williams and Mrs. Walter Luttrell were in charge of the publicity for the loan.

WELFARE ORGANIZATIONS

During the greater part of the war period, the welfare organizations of Knoxville and Knox County worked separately. Their work was not coordinated, while campaigns to maintain them and to meet their financial needs were a constant recurrence. With the Liberty Loan drives, there was a perfect cycle of these campaigns for war funds. To avoid this constant drain upon business men and to coordinate the efforts of all these organizations both in the training camps in the United States and in the divisions abroad, the United War Work Committee was formed under the supervision of the War Department. The seven welfare organizations that were members of it were the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the American Library Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, the Salvation Army and the War Camp Community Service.

The week of November 11-18, 1918, was set apart by President Wilson to solicit funds for this vital work in connection with our army and navy. Knox County was given a quota of $125,000. The sum of $127,666 was raised in the allotted time. The organization, which directed this great campaign in Knox County, was as follows: E. D. Langley, director for East Tennessee; E. L. McClurkan, director for Knox County; Robert S. Young, county chairman; Mrs. C. S. Sims, chairman for rural communities. The executive committee was composed of the following: Larkin S. Brown, John M. Gore, J. K. Middleton, Mrs. Percy Lockett, George Helm, Allen Frierson, Malcolm McDermott, and Powell Smith, who was treasurer of the funds raised.

THE Y. M. C. A.

When the world was plunged into the greatest war it had ever known, it was only natural that the Knoxville Young Men's Christian Association, with its more than sixty years' experience in working with men, should be seized with a burning desire to be of service to our men in uniform in this extreme crisis. It felt that its experience in previous wars would be of value in serving the men in this war, and so the task was accepted unhesitatingly.

The most valuable contribution, which Knox County made to the Army Y. M. C. A., was in the sending of four women and forty-three men who gave their services to the boys in camp in this country and overseas. The photographs of twenty-five of them are shown on the opposite page. They are:

(1) Fletcher Morgan; (2) Tyree C. Whitehurst; (3) Miss Ray Viola Williams; (4) Robert G. Jeffries; (5) Creed F. Copeland; (6) A. W. Fisher; (7) B. G. Alexander; (8) Mrs. George W. Denny; (9) William G. Gilliam; (10) Noble B. Peake; (11) Robert L. Houston; (12) Crew Webb; (13) E. D. Langley; (14) John Stewart French; (15) Alex. P. Watson; (16) Nathaniel Bennett White; (17) Clifford D. Webster; (18) Lewis Albert Frost; (19) Edgar S. Lotspeich; (20) W. B. Mooney; (21) E. F. Eaton; (22) Albert Victor Young; (23) Alvin O. Rue; (24) Charles H. Newell; (25) L. S. Reynolds.

During the summer of 1917, when the Third Tennessee Infantry was mobilized at Knoxville, the local organization tendered the use of its building and equipment for the benefit of the men. The offer was extended also to Colonel Gleason, who was then organizing the Second Tennessee Infantry. This offer was accepted by both Colonel Spence and Colonel Gleason for their men, and the local program was placed immediately upon a war basis.

The office was used for the distribution of soldier mail and the lobby for the writing of letters on stationery which was gladly furnished the men free of charge. The use of the building soon became so general among the men that it was apparent the small office force could not furnish the proper supervision. In order to meet this need, those in authority made several points in the building regular posts for guard duty and rendered very valuable cooperation in the matter of supervising the bath rooms and the swimming pool. No effort was made to keep a record of the number who availed themselves of this privilege, but it was noted by those on duty that a steady stream of men poured in and out of the building and swarmed the lobby and writing room all hours of the day and night.

It was not long after this that train loads of men bound for Eastern ports of embarkation passed through the city almost daily. The Camp General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in each of the Southern cantonments was notified the local organization would be glad to render whatever service possible to troops passing through Knoxville. This gave a remarkable opportunity, as the secretary on each train arranged for a stop-over so that the men might come to the Y. M. C. A. building for a shower bath or plunge in the pool. The local chapter of the Red Cross cooperated by furnishing some towels for the use of the men, and also in directing men to the building from the depot so that they might spend the night in case it was necessary to lay over between trains.

In the summer of 1918 the actual program of the Army Y. M. C. A. came directly to Knoxville and the local "Y" was called upon to put it into effect with the "seven hundred fighting mechanics," who were in training at Chilhowee Park. The program was four-fold—physical, educational, social and religious. The educational being taken care of by the University of Tennessee, the Y. M. C. A. confined itself to the promotion of the other three features. This program included quite a variety of social entertainments, musicals, lectures, stunt nights, athletic nights, etc. Very commodious quarters were established in one of the buildings at the park where there were ample facilities for reading and writing. An athletic field, where outdoor group games were promoted, added to the pleasure of the men. In the promotion of the religious program it was desired to have the men as far as possible in touch with one of the local churches, but for the benefit of some who did not care to come to the city, religious services were conducted at the park on Sunday and one evening each week.

During the progress of the war, three campaigns for Y. M. C. A. finances were waged. The first of these was in August, 1917, and the amount secured was $12,500. The second in November, 1917, resulted in the raising of $25,000. In the third campaign, which was conducted under the auspices of the United War Work Committee, the Y. M. C. A. received fifty-nine per cent of the amount raised, $125,000. The total sum contributed in Knox County during the war for Y. M. C. A. work among the soldiers, sailors and marines was $110,000.

It was not possible for the Y. M. C. A. activities to cease with the signing of the armistice, because the obligation was felt that this service must be continued to these men until the last one should be returned safely home after receiving his discharge. Quite a number of men reached Knoxville on trains late in the evening and necessarily had to remain here during the night in order to make connection the following morning. A special room was fitted up in the "Y" building and equipped with a number of cots where a comfortable sleeping place was furnished free for many hundred men passing thus through the city. Furthermore, a complimentary membership, entitling every discharged soldier or sailor to the full use of the privileges of the building, was extended to all former service men. Several hundred men availed themselves of this opportunity.

Y. W. C. A.

The Knoxville Y. W. C. A. sent four workers from its membership into camp and social welfare activities during the period of hostilities. They were Miss Emma Carson, who went to France in September, 1918; Miss Kate Carson, who had charge of the Hostess Houses at Toul and Brest, France, during the war and after the armistice; Mrs. Lytton Thomas, who was manager of the Hostess House at Camp Grant, Illinois; and Miss Frances West, who did special work among the working girls of the South Atlantic States.

To care for the large number of girls who came to Knoxville to fill vacancies made by the calling of men into the service, the Y. W. C. A. enlarged its housing facilities, leasing a large 44-room house to furnish proper homes for them. It also provided training classes in bookkeeping, stenography and other subjects for 258 different girls during 1918. A great deal of social work was done for these girls and many of them were placed in positions that they were qualified to fill.

The Hostess House at Chilhowee Park was established and maintained for the 700 mechanics in training there from July to November, 1918. As no appropriation could be obtained from the National War Council, contributions were solicited from the business men of Knoxville. The Y. W. C. A. committee, Mrs. R. W. McCargo, Mrs. F. L. Fisher and Mrs. Will D. Wright, made a personal canvass to obtain funds for improving and equipping the building, while gifts and loans of furnishings were offered voluntarily. The house was made a real home for the soldiers, their wives and their relatives. Mrs. Minnie Waring was hostess in charge.

Entertainments were given weekly by church committees, small parties were organized to promote the social life of the men, while the house was always open to them and their families. When influenza became epidemic, the Hostess House was made headquarters for the Red Cross nurses. On Sundays the Y. W. C. A. joined with the Y. M. C. A. in the religious service at the park for those who did not attend the churches in Knoxville. While the number of soldiers at Knoxville was very few in comparison with some cities, everything possible was done for their comfort while they were encamped here.

To maintain its work, the Y. W. C. A. engaged in two campaigns. The first was held in December, 1917, and under the direction of Mrs. Lewis Tillman, president of the local organization, and Mrs. C. A. Perkins, chairman of the campaign, the sum of $4,294.67 was raised in one day for its local war work. In November, 1918, the Y. W. C. A. organization joined in the United War Work Campaign to raise $125,000 for welfare work.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

The Knights of Columbus, through its local council, played an active part in all war activities in Knox County. Many members of the council volunteered their services in the army and navy at the outset of hostilities, and at the close of the war there were more than 150 members in the service. Those who were disqualified or exempted from service did whatever was assigned them. Some were Four Minute Men, while others served on the selective service boards.

When the drive for $100,000,000 was made by the seven allied organizations doing social service welfare work in the army and navy, the Knights of Columbus, through its representative, Edward F. Walsh, on the executive committee for East Tennessee, and James K. Middleton, on the executive board for Knox County, aided materially in making the campaign in Knox County successful. In this, as well as in all other public movements launched during the war for the purpose of sustaining the army and navy and for bringing victory to our country, the committees of the Knights of Columbus cooperated cheerfully and willingly with other welfare, social and religious organizations of Knoxville.

After the war was over, the local council established an employment bureau for the purpose of helping discharged service men. John T. O'Connor was in charge of it. This bureau continued in existence and did active work for more than a year after the declaration of the armistice. It was of great benefit in assisting men to find jobs and to become established in Knoxville.

JEWISH WELFARE BOARD

Cooperating with the War Department and the local military authorities in helping to administer the many small comforts to the man in service, especially the Jewish lad in khaki, the Knoxville branch of the National Jewish Welfare Board did valuable service in making the soldiers forget once in a while the rigors and discomforts of army life. It administered to men of all races and creeds, to the Catholic and the Protestant as well as to the Jew, to the negro as well as to the white soldier. But it watched especially over the Jewish boys away from home, who needed little attentions that only one versed in the Jewish religion and Jewish ways could give them.

The Knoxville branch of the Jewish Welfare Board was organized soon after the outbreak of hostilities. The following officers were chosen: Rabbi Winick, chairman; Morris Bart, vice-chairman; Ben R. Winick, secretary. After Mr. Winick entered the service, Jacob J. Winick was chosen to fill his place. The local organizations had its hands full in administering to the boys in the service and to their families. At the University of Tennessee Training Camp and at Chilhowee Park, offices were established to minister to the needs of the boys.

Dances and entertainments were given by the organization for the Jewish and non-Jewish boys. The Jewish homes of the city were thrown open to all soldiers, and on Jewish holidays the officers of the board saw to it that every Jewish home in Knoxville had at least one soldier in it. Workers from the local branch visited the camp at Fort Oglethorpe, George, as well as other nearby camps, and helped the work there. Religious services were held many times for the Jewish boys who were quartered there on duty. Stationery and supplies were furnished them and everything possible was done to make them feel that home was not far away.

The local branch saw that arrangements for the entertainment of the boys in Jewish homes were made, suitable and abundant reading matter was furnished the local camps and speakers were brought to address the men. Visits were made daily to hospitals and workers saw to it that the dependents of Jewish boys in the service did not suffer at home.

WAR LIBRARY SERVICE

Knox County's part in the nation-wide movement to provide library service and reading matter for soldiers and sailors centered in Lawson McGhee Library, the free public library of Knoxville. From the early autumn of 1918, to the summer of 1919, the library served as a collecting and distributing center for books and magazines, which were sent to Camps Sevier, Greenleaf and Gordon in the United States, and to camps overseas; to the Y. W. C. A. Hostess House and the Y. M. C. A. headquarters in Chilhowee Park, Knoxville, and to the local canteen of the American Red Cross; and through the Y. M. C. A. to the local soldiers' barracks, the Students' Army Training Corps at the University of Tennessee and at Knoxville College. In eighteen months, local committees, assisted by the staff of Lawson McGhee Library, collected, sorted, prepared for circulation, packed and shipped approximately 12,000 books and 40,000 magazines.

The first effort on the part of any local organization to provide reading matter for the soldiers was made in October, 1918, by the Knoxville branch of the Southern Association of College Women, when it appointed Mrs. Joel Tyler chairman of a committee to collect current magazines and forward them to the soldiers.

The public responded so heartily to the appeal for reading matter that the committee of the Southern Association of College Women found itself almost overwhelmed with both magazines and books; consequently, in January, 1918, the Knoxville Women's Committee of the Council of Defense assumed responsibility for collecting all books and all magazines more than a month old. The Council of Defense immediately began to plan an extensive book campaign, which, in cooperation with the national Library War Service headquarters, it conducted during the week of March 11 to 18, inclusive. Miss Mary Boyce Temple was appointed chairman of the book campaign; Miss Laura Thornburgh, vice-chairman; Mrs. T. P. Miller, chairman of collection; Mrs. W. A. Knabe, chairman of publicity and the ward chairmen of the Council of Defense were captains of solicitation. Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, schools, Parent-Teacher Associations, churches and clubs cooperated heartily and effectively in soliciting books, most of which were collected and taken to the library by the Girls' Motor Corps and by laundry and delivery wagons, the use of which was generously loaned by laundries and merchants. As a result of this campaign, not fewer than 10,000 books and 35,000 magazines were gathered at Lawson McGhee Library to be sent to camp libraries.

Meanwhile it became apparent that some more systematic arrangement was desirable in providing reading matter for troop trains. In September, 1918, therefore, Mrs. E. H. Saunders accepted the chairmanship of the Knoxville Library War Service Committee, the purpose of which was to supply clean, recent copies of popular magazines to soldiers and sailors quartered in or passing through Knoxville. The particular problem of this committee was to so systematize its solicitation and collection of magazines as to have constantly on hand a sufficient quantity to meet any demand; and to be able to deliver them to the places where they were needed on very brief notice. Though the closing of the schools on account of the influenza epidemic made it difficult to secure enough magazines, the committee, when the armistice was signed, had collected and distributed to soldiers in Knoxville about 3,000 current magazines; and they continued this work without cessation until there was no further need of it.

THE FOUR MINUTE MEN

The Four Minute Men, a nation-wide association of volunteer speakers, was organized June 16, 1917, for the purpose of assisting the various departments of the government in the work of national defense during the continuance of the war, by presenting messages on subjects of vital national importance to motion-picture audiences during the intermission. The subject matter was prepared and the speaking was directed from Washington under authority of the government.

The Knox County division of the Four Minute Men was organized in September, 1917, to further this patriotic work. The following members, who served during the war, were recognized and commended individually by the government for their work:

J. Pike Powers, Jr., chairman; H. R. Ryder, secretary; J. H. Anderson, J. Arthur Atchley, C. M. Boyer, R. A. Brown, H. V. Carson, Charles T. Cates, Jr., Allen Frierson, John W. Green, I. L. Graves, George E. Helm, Harry Hyman, S. O. Houston, Fred C. Houk, Henry Hudson, C. Raleigh Harrison, Sam E. Hill, J. Alvin Johnson, James G. Johnson, C. P. Jones, W. T. Kennerly, Daniel J. Kelly, John M. Kelly, W. E. Miller, A. E. Mitchell, R. E. Mooney, Malcolm McDermodt, Norman B. Morrell, Melville Melendy, B. C. Ogle, Roy E. Vale, E. G. Stooksbury, K. E. Steinmetz, L. D. Smith, John M. Thornburgh, Hugh M. Tate, Horace VanDeventer, William P. Washburn, Robert P. Williams, J. Bailey Wray, Roscoe Word, Edward F. Walsh, D. C. Webb, Will D. Wright, T. Asbury Wright, O. L. White.

The topics spoken upon by the Four Minute Men were matters of national importance connected with the war plans of the government. They were assigned by the director in Washington for a given period of time, usually from one to four weeks. The topic to be used at any given time was determined by a consideration of what was uppermost at the time. Many false rumors, the result of enemy propaganda, also were corrected and explained by the Four Minute Men.

The aid of the Four Minute Men in the Liberty Loan, Red Cross and other patriotic drives was invaluable. The importance of participation in them was deeply impressed upon the minds of all audiences. Addresses were made not only at the theaters, but at many popular gatherings in the city and county. The speakers were in great demand, and they always responded to the calls upon their time and their services. They proved of invaluable aid in popularizing the war to the mass of people, and in explaining its causes and purposes. The efforts of the government found through them a most valuable publicity arm.

The work of the Four Minute Men was enhanced greatly by the cooperation of the managers of the local theaters, who gave them every possible assistance and courtesy. The speakers, who made almost nightly addresses, delivered their appeals during the intermissions between reels. Pastors of churches, principals of schools and managers of public buildings also cooperated in this important government work by opening their doors to these speakers. The effectiveness of the appeals was heightened by the time limit set upon the addresses and the definite program outlined from Washington.

THE WOMEN'S CLUBS

The women of Knoxville gave themselves unselfishly and wholeheartedly to every war movement. They not only supported the larger organizations, like the Red Cross and the five Liberty Loans, but they also carried on their humanitarian activities through their clubs and patriotic chapters. The programs of peace were laid aside, and only war work was done or discussed. The clubs became work shops or clearing houses for ideas on how to help most effectively the national war program.

Three organizations especially were active in this war work. They were Ossoli Circle, the oldest woman's club in the South and the training school for the women workers of Knoxville; the Knoxville Unit of the Woman's Committee, Council of National Defense; and Bonny Kate Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution.

OSSOLI CIRCLE

This club began its war work by a call for a mass meeting of all women desiring to do necessary hospital sewing for soldiers. It was the pioneer organization in Knoxville in the making of hospital garments and in knitting. In addition to financing itself, the club organized 35 auxiliaries in the city and county. Upon request of the local chapter of the Red Cross, this work was transferred to it and became the Central Garment Department of its organization.

On June 5, 1917, Ossoli organized the first patriotic parade held in Knoxville after the declaration of war. The occasion was to honor the men and boys who dedicated on that day their lives to their country's service by registering for military duty. Ossoli later participated in the Liberty Loan and War Savings Stamp parades.

After the transfer of garment making to the Red Cross, the members of the club took up Belgian Relief work and carried it on for fifteen months. Under the chairmanship of Mrs. Charles T. Cates, Jr., who was assisted by several committees, five boxes, containing 3,372 new garments, and two boxes, holding towels, pajamas, and other articles of clothing, were shipped to the Commission on Relief of the Belgians. Later the club sent eight barrels of shoes and 39 boxes of good clothing, numbering 11,355 pieces. More than $2,000 was raised and expended for Belgian relief and garment making.

During April and August, 1918, two receptions were tendered to drafted men who were leaving for training camps. A reception also was given to Governor Rye and Major Rutledge Smith upon the occasion of their visit in February, 1918, in the interest of war work. The Woman's Club building was offered generously free of all charge for all patriotic purposes, and freely it was used during the war. There were held farewell meetings, there wreaths were twined to throw around the departing soldiers, there garments were sewed, woolen goods knitted, and there the glad welcoming feasts were partly prepared. The service flag of Ossoli Circle contains the names of 41 men, one of whom, Lieutenant Carrick Yeager, made the supreme sacrifice.

THE WOMAN'S COUNCIL

The Knoxville Unit of the Woman's Committee, Council of National Defense, was organized in the spring of 1917 with the following officers: Mrs. George F. Mellen, chairman; Miss Mary Boyce Temple, vice-chairman; Miss Laura Thornburgh, secretary; Mrs. Morris Deitch, treasurer. The city organization was completed by the appointment of 17 department chairmen and the formation throughout the city of 23 units for war work.

These committees and their chairmen were: Food Conservation, Mrs. A. P. Lockett; Food Production, Mrs. W. L. Morris, Mrs. Faulkner; Protection of Women Workers, Mrs. W. M. Goodman, Mrs. S. P. Wallace; Child Welfare, Mrs. Horace VanDeventer, Mrs. Alfred Sanford; Conservation of Moral and Spiritual Forces, Mrs. Lewis Tillman, Miss Cornelia Cowan; Social Service, Mrs. R. E. L.

Mountcastle, Mrs. A. H. Dailey; Red Cross, Mrs. N. E. Logan, Mrs. Lena B. Warner; Medical Service, Mrs. Chas. T. Cates, Jr.; Allied Relief, Miss Kate White, Mrs. Ben Boyd; Courses of Instruction, Mrs. C. A. Perkins, Mrs. Emma L. Rice; Educational Propaganda, Mrs. L. D. Tyson, Mrs. Hu L. McClung; Finance, Mrs. Walter Nash, Mrs. H. C. Milner; Publicity, Mrs. T. P. Miller, Miss Florence Fair; Speakers' Bureau, Mrs. C. E. Lucky, Mrs. R. L. Cunningham; Comfort Association, Mrs. Sam G. Shields, Mrs. Daisy Woodruff Meek.

Among the patriotic work that was done by the Knoxville Unit through these committees was the following: (1) Four campaigns for the signing of Hoover food cards were held, resulting in the signing of 19,000 cards in the city and county. (2) Registration of women for war work on October 13, 1917, about 2,200 signifying their willingness. (3) The sale of a special edition of one of the local daily newspapers, from which about $1,100 was realized. This money was used in war work. (4) Christmas boxes of "sweets and smokes" were sent to Fort Oglethorpe and money contributed to home charities. (5) A conservation exchange was maintained at which excess products were sold and a market made for home-made articles of every kind. (6) About 15,000 Hoover Kitchen Cards, urging economy, were placed in the hands of housewives in the city and county. (7) Wool was purchased and socks knitted at the council's headquarters. These were sent to soldiers at the camps. (8) The members of the unit took part in the parades and sales of Liberty Loan bonds and War Savings Stamps. (9) War food demonstrations were given at the council's headquarters. (10) All members gave their assistance in the collection of books and magazines for camp libraries. (11) The War Garden movement was enthusiastically supported by the council.

The Knoxville unit was always at the call of the state organization, and whenever any kind of patriotic or war work was needed, it rallied and responded unhesitatingly to the demand of the hour.

BONNY KATE CHAPTER

Like all other organizations of the city, Bonny Kate Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, engaged in patriotic work throughout the eighteen months this nation was at war with Germany. Its members worked in the chapter, in the other clubs, and in all patriotic movements that furthered the war. Through the enthusiasm and earnestness of the regent, Miss Mary Boyce Temple, the chapter was an active force in war work.

Flag day was observed June 14, 1917, and four months later, October 7, a splendid religious-patriotic celebration was held at the Bijou Theatre upon the occasion of the chapter's twenty-fourth birthday. Captain Pierre Lorient, of the French Embassy, Major Benton, commandant at the University of Tennessee, and Captain Woodbury were the speakers. Every organization of the city was represented on the stage. This meeting, together with others that were held later, aroused the war spirit in the city and county.

In February, 1918, a first aid class of 25 was organized, and in June another member formed a class of young girls to knit for the soldiers. Another knitting class, formed by the regent, outfitted the entire crew of the Dahlgren, one of our naval craft, on which there were two Knoxville boys. They were provided with sweaters, wristlets, and mufflers or helmets. Another box of knitted goods was sent to the battleship Tennessee, another to the 117th Infantry at Camp Sevier, while two others went to the navy.

The chapter aided in the garden movement, in making bandages, hospital garments and trench candles for the Red Cross, and in working at the canteen at the Southern Station. The chapter also contributed liberally from its funds to support these organizations. It gave its active support and aid to the Woman's Council of National Defense in the registration of women, in the distribution of Hoover pledge cards and in the campaign for reserve nurses. Its members were active in all the Liberty Loan and Red Cross campaigns. The chapter adopted a French war orphan, while its members individually gave their financial support to the adoption of several others. At Chilhowee Park, Bonny Kate Chapter was one of the hostesses at the Y. W. C. A. Hostess House.
